THE BOOK OF

J O B.

That division of the Holy Scriptures upon which we now enter, comprising the Book of Job, the Psalms, and the Writings of Solomon, is called by the Jews Chethubim, writings; rendered Hagiographa, or holy writings; though they include several other books, without reason or propriety. In these parts of the sacred oracles there is greater depth and apparent difficulty than in those which precede: but the instruction is in general more immediately prepared for use; and the real benefit of perusing the Scriptural history much depends upon the degree of our previous acquaintance with the books before us. In like manner, we shall read the records of our Saviour's miracles and discourses to edification, in proportion as we have understood the epistolary part of the New Testament; which though more difficult in many respects, conveys instruction in more direct and explicit terms.—We begin with the Book of Job, which some learned men have employed much pains, ingeniously, but very unwarrantably, to interpret as an allegory. The prophet Ezekiel mentions Job, Noah, and Daniel, as three persons of eminent piety; (xiv. 14. 20:) and the apostle James illustrates the advantages of patience, by the example of Job, as he had before done his doctrine of faith and works by the examples of Abraham and of Rahab. (Jam. ii. 21—25. v. 11.) No reasonable doubt therefore can remain but that the narrative of this book is historical truth: though we may safely allow that, as the discourses of Job and his friends are recorded in poetical language, their sentiments and arguments alone are transmitted to us, and not the exact words which they used in conversation. But there is no sufficient ground for questioning, whether the transactions, relating to the world of spirits, good and evil, actually for substance occurred. It is indeed evident, that this could not be known, except by revelation: but as the book itself records several supernatural visions, and a glorious appearance of God himself speaking from the whirlwind; this creates no difficulty to those who consider it as true, and as a part of the sacred canon. As such, the Jews have always regarded it, though not favourable to Job, because he was a Gentile, that is, not an Israelite, or descendant of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, (Note, i. 1;) and St. Paul's manner of quoting it, with "It is written," shews that he considered it as a part of the oracles of God. (Comp. Job, v. 13. i Cor. iii. 19.) A very high antiquity is generally ascribed to this book; nay, some think it the most ancient work now extant in the world. The long life to which Job attained; the great remains of patriarchal religion in the land of Uz; the worship of the sun and moon being the only idolatry mentioned in it; and no express allusion being made to the Mosaic law, or the wonderful works of God towards Israel; with several peculiarities in the style and composition of the work, give sanction to this opinion. Some learned men, indeed, perceiving a similarity of sentiment between some parts of this book, and passages in the Psalms and Proverbs, would assign it a much later origin: but wise and pious persons will often, without copying from each other, give the same instructions, and be of the same opinion; and it is at least as probable, that David and Solomon alluded to the book of Job, as that the writer of that book alluded to their works, if any intended reference be supposed.—Indeed, the date of the events which it records cannot be exactly ascertained: but it is very likely, that Job was in his first prosperity, between the time when Joseph died, and the appearance of Moses in Pharaoh's court as Israel's deliverer: and the language used by God himself, that "there was none like him in all the earth, seems to give probability to this opinion; for there is no other eminent character mentioned in Scripture as flourishing during that period.—It is not agreed, who wrote this book. Some ascribe all of it to Job himself, except the conclusion. Some to Elihu, who in one place seems to address the reader concerning his auditory. (Note, xxxii. 15—17.) But others think that Moses was the author of it. The style was likewise induced an opinion, that it was written in the Arabic language: perhaps Elihu wrote it in Arabic, and Moses rendered it into Hebrew.—The first two chapters are in prose; the style of them is very plain; and they form an introduction to the poetical part, which is in many places peculiarly figurative and sublime, and consequently more difficult to be interpreted. The latter part of the last chapter is an historical conclusion of the whole.—It cannot be clearly shewn, that this book contains any prophecies, properly so called; because the passages which might be adduced as prophetic, may also be considered as a profession of faith in the promised Redeemer, and concerning a future resurrection: but few parts of the Old Testament declare more explicitly the grand outlines of revealed truth, nay, even of evangelical doctrine; so that, they who speak of it, as consisting chiefly of natural religion, seem to have entirely mistaken the scope of it.—It opens with an account of Job's piety and prosperity, the charge of hypocrisy and selfishness which Satan brought against him, and the permission which he obtained from God, to reduce him to the deepest distress, as a trial of his integrity. It proceeds to relate how his former friends, witnessing his unprecedented misery, were led to condemn him as a wicked man. This gave rise to a warm controversy, whether heavy afflictions prove any person, who is apparently pious, to be a hypocrite. In disputing this point, the principles of true religion were argued from by all parties as undoubted truths, and many excellent things were spoken; but the whole had in it a sad mixture of human infirmity. When they could by no means come to an agreement upon the subject, Elihu, who had heard the debate, with great modesty and solemnity, interfered; and, having first censured the other disputants for groundlessly condemning Job, he proceeded to reprove him for his improper eagerness in justifying himself, by which he had reflected on the justice of God. While he was discoursing, the Lord himself spake out of a whirlwind, and by a discovery of his incomprehensible majesty and glory, made Job sensible of his presumption, and brought him to humble himself before him as a vile and polluted sinner. This being effected, he justified Job from the charge of hypocrisy, and condemned the conduct and language of his friends; and having decided the controversy in favour of Job, he appointed him to sacrifice and intercede in their behalf, that they might be forgiven. The whole closes with an account of Job's deliverance, and redoubled prosperity, honour, and comfort.—It is a book full of caution and encouragement to the tempted and afflicted; and of warning to those who hastily judge their brethren. It throws great light upon the doctrine of Providence, and upon the agency and influence of evil spirits, under the control of God. We see in Job an eminent type of the suffering and glorified Saviour; and a pattern of the believer's "passing through much tribulation into the kingdom of God." In short, the whole is replete with most important instruction: and among the rest, we are reminded of the ill effects of acrimonious religious dispute. These four pious men argued together, till, becoming angry, they censured and condemned each other, and uttered many things irreverent about the Divine character and government; and, having lost their temper, would have also lost their labour, and have been more at variance than ever, if another method had not been taken of deciding the controversy.

NOTES.

CHAP. I. V. 1. The land of Uz seems to have been a district of Arabia, to the south-east of Canaan; though some suppose, that it was situated in Idumæa, and that Job was descended from Esau. (Marg. Ref.) Others think that he descended from Abraham by Keturah; yet it seems more probable that he was of the posterity of Huz, the son of Nahor. (Gen. xxii. 20—24.) He is supposed to have lived before any part of the Scriptures was written, but he was acquainted with the truths and will of God, by tradition and immediate revelation; and so he was not a gentile, as that term may imply a stranger to revealed truth, as many seem to interpret it. His religion and that of his friends was evidently the same with that of the patriarchs. He was, however, a man of most eminent piety, upright, fervent, and steadfast in religion, and exemplary in his whole conduct; one who regarded the authority of God, revered his majesty, and habitually worshipped and obeyed him. So that he carefully avoided sin and temptation, and "exercised himself to have a conscience void of offence towards God and man." His subsequent trials tended to his greater humiliation; but he was previously an eminent believer, and an excellent character.—"True, blameless, just, godly, abstaining from every evil deed." (Sept.)

V. 2, 3. (Marg. Ref.)—When the earth was but thinly inhabited, it was easier to acquire land, than to cultivate it, or to procure cattle to feed on it,

4 And his sons went and feasted in their houses, every one his day; and sent and called for their three sisters, to eat and to drink with them.

5 And it was so, when the days of their feasting were gone about, that Job sent and sanctified them, and rose up early in the morning, and offered burnt-offerings according to the number of them all: for Job said, "It may be that my sons have sinned, and cursed God in their hearts." Thus did Job continually.

6 ¶ Now there was a day when the sons of God came to present themselves before the LORD, and Satan came also among them.

7 And the LORD said unto Satan, "Whence comest thou?" Then Satan answered the LORD, and said,

"I am a vagabond, and a wanderer; I dwell in the tents of the wilderness, and I dwell in the tents of the wilderness."

(as the case still is in several parts of America, and in newly discovered countries:) so that Job's wealth is reckoned by the number of his cattle; not by the extent of his lands. He was the principal person in that country; had abundance of every thing which constituted riches among them; and acted as a magistrate, or ruler: though it does not appear that he was, properly speaking, a king, as many suppose him to have been. (Εὐγενής, noble, Sept.)

V. 4. The sons of Job, now grown up and settled in houses of their own, cheerfully enjoyed their abundance: and, as they lived in brotherly love, they were accustomed at certain seasons to entertain each other alternately. It does not appear, that Job made one at these feasts; (2 Sam. xiii. 24, 25;) but whenever his sons met, they invited their sisters to join their company, which both shewed a proper affection for them, and evinced that no indecency, or riot, attended their feasting.

V. 5. As Job had, no doubt, piously educated his children, and set them an excellent example, and offered many prayers for and with them; we may suppose that they were well affected to religion. Indeed, nothing is intimated to the disadvantage of their characters, and no feasting could be more inoffensive than their's seems to have been. But while their pious father could not but behold their harmony and comfort with satisfaction; his knowledge of the human heart suggested a jealous fear, lest their cheerfulness should betray them into some levity or excess, some vain conversation, or some injurious thoughts of God, either tending to infidelity, to dislike of his holy worship and service, or to idolatrous love of worldly enjoyments. When therefore their feasting was ended, acting as the priest of his family, "he sent and sanctified them," reminding them to examine themselves, to confess their sins, to seek forgiveness, and to prepare their hearts to attend the ordinances of God with seriousness and humble devotion; and he offered a burnt-offering for each of them. (Notes, 1 Sam. xvi. 5. 2 Chr. xxix. 5.) Thus he taught them, that even the secret unbelief, ingratitude, and rebellion of the heart, merited condemnation, and could only be expiated by the shedding of blood and the offering of sacrifice, in repentance and humble faith. As he did this continually, we may thence understand his unremitting care of his family, the tenderness of his conscience, his knowledge of the fallen state of man, and the depravity of human nature; his entire dependence on the mercy of God in the way which he had appointed, and his believing regard to the promised Redeemer.—The word rendered "cursed God," in this and several subsequent passages, in its usual meaning signifies to bless; yet, it must be understood in a bad sense in this place, and when employed by Satan concerning Job: it is the same word which is used, when Naboth was accused of "cursing God and the king;" and consequently stoned as a blasphemer and traitor. "Let my sons in their mind have thought evil against God." (Sept.) Some think this was substituted instead of the word which more generally signifies to curse, from reverence to God. Others suppose it signifies to salute, as men do when they meet or part with others, and thus is used to denote departing from God, or renouncing him. But the learned Mr. Leigh brings a quotation from Mr. Selden, which seems more satisfactory, and which I shall therefore translate. "It is most certain, that the verb barak signifies to execrate, or to curse, as well as to bless; and this, as I think, not by antiphrasis, as some will have it; but almost from the very idiom of the sacred language, it may signify either way, according to the connexion in which it is used, as among the Latins sacrare and imprecari. For, as the first signifies at some times to devote any one by curses to destruction, and at others to consecrate any thing to God; and as we call for either good or evil upon others: so, barak denotes what a man wishes or calls for, with an ardent mind, whether it be salvation or perdition. And when applied to the Deity, it either signifies addressing him by praises and thanksgivings, (which is more common,) or with revilings and reproaches; and the difference is to be collected from the nature of the case, and from the context.—'Bless the gods, in their hearts.' (E. Smith.) No other God except the true God, is mentioned in Job, nor any other idolatry but the worship of the sun and moon. The original has not the article, and must be rendered either God, or gods, not the gods, and the clause is exactly the same as is used of the true God, in the next chapter. (Note, ii. 9.)

V. 6. The holy angels, no doubt, are here meant by "the sons of God;" because they love him, and are beloved of him, as his children. (Marg. Ref. Note, xxxviii. 4–7.) They are here introduced to our notice, as on some special occasion presenting themselves before the Lord, to give an account of their late services, and to receive further commands; in delightful obedience to which, their happiness greatly consists: and Satan, the adversary of God and of his whole creation, is represented as intruding himself among them. "From going to and fro in the earth, and from walking up and down in it.

8 And the LORD said unto Satan, Hast thou considered "my servant Job, that there is none like him in the earth, a perfect and an upright man, one that feareth God, and escheweth evil?"

9 Then Satan answered the LORD, and said, "Doth Job fear God for nought?"

10 Hast not thou made "an hedge about him, and about his house, and about all that he hath on every side?" "Thou hast blessed the work of his hands, and his substance is increased in the land:"

determining any thing about the place or way, in which this evil spirit appeared before God, or associated with his angels; or whether the transactions of the invisible world be not described in language, adapted rather to our conceptions than to their real nature; we hence learn, that Job's extraordinary afflictions originated from the malice and agency of Satan, by divine permission for wise and holy purposes: and many truths, respecting the character and influence of the devil and his angels, are thus emphatically proposed to our attentive consideration. These apostate spirits are continually intruding into the company of the children of God on earth, especially when they meet in his ordinances, or approach his mercy-seat. And they would dare to intrude even into heaven, the habitation of God's holiness, if access were allowed them, to join the company of his holy angels: yet this would not in the least degree change their evil nature; for wherever they go, they are instigated by malice, and seeking to do mischief. But, as God is every where present, (though in heaven his glory is especially displayed,) all that is spoken upon these subjects may be literally understood, without supposing that they are ever admitted into that holy place. (Note, 1 Kings xxii. 19–23.)—Sons of perdition, came to set themselves against JEHOVAH, and the Satan came also among them.—(To make out this meaning, it should have been at the head of them.) (E. Smith.) This most adventurous alteration, made on the slightest grounds, even by the confession of Dr. Randolph, the editor, contrary to the concurrent opinion of all preceding versions, critics, and expositors, shews the dangerous extent to which the sacred oracles may be altered, by an attachment to new notions, and a slight consideration of the subject.

V. 7. When the holy angels had given an account of their services; Satan is represented as interrogated. Whence he came, and what he had been doing? And his answer seems to have implied an arrogant claim to be "the god and prince of this world;" and, in the spirit of pride and self-vindication, he avowed that he had been traversing his dominions, without exceeding the bounds assigned him. It also denoted his restless malice, and unwearied endeavours to do mischief. (Notes, 1 Pet. v. 8, 9.)

V. 8. Satan seemed to advance a claim to the earth, as if it had been all his own; but the Lord gave him to understand, that he had a remnant of servants there: and as this accuser had always something to urge against every believer, he was asked, whether he had fully considered Job's character and conduct. (Notes, Zech. iii. 1–4. Rev. xii. 7–12.)—The express attestation of God to Job's integrity and piety, as the most faithful servant he had at that time on earth, is sufficient to demonstrate that he was not a self-righteous Pharisee before his afflictions; as some persons, from undue regard to system, have ventured to speak of him.

V. 9–11. Satan could not deny the excellency of Job's conduct; but he subtly insinuated, that he was mercenary in his religion, and served God, not from love to him or his ways, but for what he could get; or at least, that in his present circumstances the contrary could not be demonstrated. It was worth his while to keep up a regard to religion, for he grew rich, prosperous, and honourable by it. He had no temptation to fraud or oppression; for he had all that he could wish, in a more safe and creditable manner. He had nothing to ruffle his temper, or to render him distrustful or discontented; therefore the reality of his faith, meekness, and acquiescence in the will of God, might fairly be questioned. In short, if duly tried, he would be found a different man: and if the Lord would himself, "put forth his hand, and touch," (that is, take from him, or imbitter to him,) "all that he had;" he would not only murmur and fret, which a true believer might be tempted to do; but not only indulge hard thoughts of God, as Job suspected that his sons might have cursed God in their hearts; but he would openly blaspheme God and renounce religion. (Note, 5.) The last clause is literally, "If he curse thee not to thy face;" which implies that more was meant than expressed: "If it be not so, I am greatly mistaken, or I will consent to be punished as a false witness." "Whether to thy face, he will not bless thee? (Curse thee.)" (E. Smith.)—"Certainly he will bless thee to thy face." (Sept.)—God had declared Job to be the most eminent saint upon earth; and if Satan could have succeeded in this attempt, he would really have made out his claim to the dominion over the whole human race: and though he failed, he yet had an opportunity of gratifying his malice in Job's sufferings. But with inward anguish he was constrained to confess, that he was not able to break through the hedge of continual protection, which God had placed round the person, substance, and family of his servant; or to give the least disturbance to the peace and blessings which Job enjoyed in his favour, and under the watchful care of his overruling providence.

12 And the LORD said unto Satan, "Behold, all that he hath is in thy power; only upon himself put not forth thine hand." So Satan went forth from the presence of the LORD.

13 ¶ And there was a day, when his sons and his daughters were eating and drinking wine in their eldest brother's house:

14 And there came a messenger unto Job, and said, The oxen were plowing, and the asses feeding beside them;

15 And the Sabeans fell upon them, and took them away; yea, they have slain the servants with the edge of the sword; and I only am escaped alone to tell thee.

19 And, behold, there came a great wind from the wilderness, and smote the four corners of the house, and it fell upon the young men, and they are dead; and I only am escaped alone to tell thee.

20 Then Job arose, and rent his mantle, and shaved his head, and fell down upon the ground, and worshipped,

21 And said, "Naked came I out of my mother's womb, and naked shall I return thither: the LORD gave, and the LORD hath taken away; blessed be the name of the LORD."

22 In all this Job sinned not, nor charged God foolishly.

inconsiderately objected to the scriptural commendation of his patience; yet, probably, no mere man ever suffered so much and so long with equal resignation and constancy.

V. 20-22. Job acted as one who felt the weight of his afflictions, but did not sink under them, or lose possession of his soul. He expressed his inward anguish in the customary manner; and behaved, not like one furious or distracted, but with silent and reflecting sorrow. Having rent his mantle, and shaved his head, he prostrated himself, and worshipped the Lord. He acknowledged, that he came into the world naked and indigent, and was no poorer after all his losses, than when he was born. He recollected that he should soon leave the world, and restore his body to the earth, from which it was taken, as the common parent of all; and that he could carry nothing away with him. He had received all from the unmerited bounty of God, who had seen good to remand his substance and his children, a little before the time when otherwise he must have left them: and his body and soul, his faith and hope, his heavenly inheritance, and his God, still remained to him. Whoever were the instruments, the Lord was acknowledged as the author of his calamities; he had no heart to revile the Sabeans and Chaldeans, and others concerned in his losses. He was assured, in his judgment, whatever his feelings were, that God had a sovereign right to dispose of him and his, as he pleased, and that he had done nothing inconsistent with his infinite wisdom, justice, truth, and goodness. Instead therefore of blaspheming, as Satan had predicted, he praised, blessed, and thanked the Lord, in faith, love, and humble resignation.—Thus far he stood the trial most honourably, and did not even utter a single expression, which in any measure reflected upon the Divine conduct. (Marg. reading.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1-5. "In every nation he that feareth God, and worketh righteousness, is accepted of him;" (Note, Acts x. 34, 35.) and he will have some even of the wealthy and prosperous of the world to serve him; "for with him nothing shall be impossible." (Note, Matt. xix. 23-26.)—When the heart is upright, and devoted to God, the general conduct will be holy, and he will be served with the whole man: for, the genuine fear of his name will produce habitual hatred of sin, and watchfulness against it.—We receive our children, as well as every other comfort, from the Lord; we ought therefore carefully to train them up for him, and to keep them from the contagion of this evil world; and we cannot but rejoice to see them grow up, living in peace and love. We should, however, be careful not to set our hearts too much upon them; as we know not how soon they may be torn from us, or made the occasions of our deepest distress; but we ought to commit them to God by constant prayer, and seek his grace to enable us to be submissive, however he may dispose of them.—It cannot be expected, but that young people will pay attention to things not directly sinful, for which their pious parents may have no relish; it is not evil in itself to rejoice in the bounty of Providence, and to use hospitality towards our friends and relatives; and it is a pleasant sight to behold the several branches of a family love, and enjoy, each other's company. Yet every indulgence disposes us to unwatchfulness, and forgetfulness of God: and we seldom feast together in the most friendly and decent manner, without having cause to repent of some part of our conduct and conversation; or at least of the thoughts and temper of our hearts. All of which we are thus conscious must be washed away in the atoning blood of Christ, or it will rise up against us in judgment at the last day. We have therefore cause for continual self-examination; and after every social interview, we must bestow pains to bring our hearts into due frame for the ordinances of God. Parents also should watch over their children, and exhort, instruct, and assist them, in thus seeking an interest in the great Redeemer, and in preparing to commemorate his death at the Lord's table. The higher men are advanced in rank or authority, the more important is it, that they pay regard to these duties, for an example to their inferiors: but, alas! how few of our nobles and rulers, in this Christian land, imitate Job, in this open profession of godliness, and this strict attention to religion in his family! Yet the consistent believer will attend on these things continually.

V. 12. Thus the Lord gave Satan permission to deprive Job of all those comforts and possessions, for the sake of which he was supposed to serve him. But he would not allow the enemy to wound or to kill his body; or even to assail his soul with those horrid temptations, which evidently formed a principal part of his subsequent trials. This permission was granted, not because Job had any special need of chastisement; but that his integrity, and the power of divine grace in him, might be manifested to Satan's confusion, the real benefit of Job, the edification of the church in future ages, and the glory of God in all these respects.

V. 13. Satan knew how fearful Job was lest his sons should sin amidst their festivity; and he seems to have chosen this day for his purpose, that the calamities might be construed into Divine judgments.

V. 14, 15. One messenger was spared to carry the tidings of each calamity, that the sudden and certain information, which Job received, might overwhelm his mind at once; and that he might not have time to recover himself from his consternation, or to seek support from God, of which a more gradual information would have admitted.—The servants were at their work, and lost their lives in defending their master's property.—The Sabeans were a tribe of the Arabians, or freebooters, who infested those regions; but it is uncertain whether descended from Abraham, either by Ishmael, or Keturah. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 16. This servant naturally called the extraordinary lightning, which consumed all the flocks of sheep, "the fire of God;" and the expression might aid Satan's temptation, as it seemed to imply that God fought against Job, and was become his enemy. If this fire had destroyed the Sabeans with their ill-gotten booty, the Divine justice would have been manifest; but that they should escape, while the servants of pious Job were slain, and the flocks destroyed, from which so many burnt-offerings had been sacrificed to the Lord, seemed very mysterious and perplexing.—We cannot determine, in what manner this and other effects were produced by Satan; who is "the prince of the power of the air;" (Note, Eph. ii. 1, 2;) and is, no doubt, able, when permitted, to cause any such phenomena. (Note, Deut. xiii. 1, 2.) It is generally agreed that the tremendous appearances on mount Sinai were produced by the ministrations of holy angels: and though fallen angels have lost their holy dispositions and moral powers, they retain their natural capacities; and doubtless could, if they were allowed, produce similar effects: at least, it is impossible to prove the contrary, seeing we cannot explain the manner, or ascertain the boundaries, of their operations. But they are absolutely in the Lord's hands, and can exercise their powers only by his permission: and this alone is the security of our bodies, minds, relatives, friends, or possessions.

V. 17. The Chaldeans seem at this time to have been an inconsiderable roving tribe; but they afterwards became a powerful nation. (Notes, Is. xxiii. 13. Hab. i. 5-7.)

V. 18, 19. This greatest affliction was reserved for the last, that it might drive Job desperate, when the hand of God seemed to be thus gone forth against him. The loss of one child has often been more than an affectionate parent could support with decent resignation: but for a whole flourishing family, educated with pious care, and for years insinuating into their father's affections; who were all now grown up, living in harmony, affluence, and credit, and likely to perpetuate his name and prosperity; to be all cut off at once, suddenly, and, as it appeared, by the immediate hand of God, when they were feasting, and not at their sacrifices! this, added to all the preceding unprecedented misfortunes, was sufficient to have driven most men distracted, or to have urged them to bitter complaints, or even desperate imprecations. When we have endeavoured to conceive aright of Job's circumstances, comforts, and prospects, on the morning of this eventful day, and of the dreadful change which took place before evening; and when we realize, from experience and observation, the feelings of the human heart under trials comparatively trivial, we shall be able to form some faint idea of the immense load, which was at once laid upon this eminent servant of God; and the strength of his faith and grace appear, in the manner in which he supported it. And though, afterwards, the still accumulating weight extorted from him some impatient expressions, which many have

V. 6-12. No man is proved to be a true Christian by being found in company with the children of God, even when they appear before him in his house, or at his table. Could Satan enter heaven, and associate with angels, he would still remain a liar and a murderer, ambitious, subtle, envious, and malignant: and while holy spirits delighted in the service of their God, he would be plotting mischief against his cause and people. We should therefore enquire, not only, whither we go, and what company we keep? but also, what our intentions and dispositions are?—We ought likewise to expect temptations, and that offences will continue in the church; and should chiefly look to ourselves: for we must every one give an account of himself to God.—May we imitate those holy and loving angels, who are "all worshipping spirits, sent forth to minister unto them who shall be heirs of salvation!"—Satan claims this earth as his domain; and, alas! he hath hitherto had too much ground for his arrogant pretensions: and as he continually "goeth about, seeking whom he may devour," we ought to be always sober and vigilant. But there is a remnant who are rescued from his tyranny, and are the servants of God, in whom he is glorified, and over whom he rejoices.—They, who are disposed to represent the most blameless professors of godliness, as hypocrites or mercenary; to put a bad construction upon harmless, or even good, actions; and to insinuate some suspicion, or objection, in order to detract from the commendations bestowed upon pious and useful men, may easily know whose children they are, whose example they follow, and whose work they do. For they resemble, in every feature, Satan, the envenomed slanderer and "accuser of the brethren." It is indeed true, that God will not suffer his people to serve him for nought. Their best interests are secured; no good thing they do shall lose its reward; and he will give them as many worldly comforts as he sees good for them. Yet every believer serves God from love, gratitude, and zeal, and delights in his holy commandments. When called to it, he will part with every temporal possession for his sake: and it is impossible that he, who loves God above all things, should fail of being eternally happy in the fruition of him. But untried faith is not much to be depended on: if ease, wealth, and pleasure, uniformly attended piety; if there were no cross, self-denial, or temptation, to serve as a touchstone, or a furnace, it would be very difficult to distinguish the believer from the hypocrite: and therefore Satan is often allowed to sift and prove the people of God, that he may be the more confounded. (Notes, xxii. 8-12. Luke xxii. 31-34. Jam. i. 2-4. 12. 1 Pet. i. 6, 7. iv. 12-16.) He means to destroy, defile, or distress them: but the Lord intends to demonstrate the reality and power of his grace in them, for his own glory and their important good.—Little do we know what plots are forming against us in the invisible world; nor are we sufficiently sensible of the number, power, malice, and subtlety, of our unseen adversaries. We bolt and bar, to keep out a few ruffians of our own species, who might come to plunder or murder us while we sleep: but there are legions of infernal spirits, whom we can by no means exclude, and who are able in a moment to distract, torment, or destroy us. Blessed be the Lord, his power limits the operations of these malicious foes: and the protection which he affords to ungodly men against their destructive rage, is a most wonderful instance of his patience and lovingkindness. Yet, as they generally disbelieve, or disregard, the being and agency of evil spirits, they are "taken captive by them at their will," and are hurried on in rebellion against God. But they who love the Lord are assured of protection. Their enemies can never break through the hedge, which the Almighty God hath made around them: and even when he permits them to be tempted, neither the devil nor his emissaries can exceed the limits assigned them.

V. 13-22. The delight of Satan and of all his servants is to do mischief: they will go to the full length of their chain; and we do not know how far they may be permitted to practise and prosper against us. We see in the example before us, to what an extent they may be successful; and, though they are seldom allowed to proceed so far, we should be thankful that they can go no farther; and should prepare for the worst. One calamity may succeed another, and every one be heavier than the preceding: they may come on us from every quarter, with every circumstantial aggravation: we may be entirely impoverished and bereaved; indeed, no man can declare all that we may suffer, even when our grand interest is safe, and all things are working together for our good. But, if in all our troubles we look to our gracious God, he will repress our murmurs, and support us under our afflictions. However unjust the instruments of our correction may be, he is righteous in all that is laid upon us. Our all is from his gift, we have forfeited it by sin, and ought not to complain if he take any part of it from us. We have received all our possessions, since we came naked into this world; and we must leave every earthly comfort and advantage when we go out of it; for they were only imparted, to bear the expenses of our journey, and to assist our fellow-travellers. Soon will our bodies be conveyed to the earth from whence they were taken, and our souls into the eternal world: and should we be spoiled of all, and bereaved of our beloved children or friends, before we depart; we shall not live long to feel our loss, and the hopes and earnest of heaven will support us under it. May we then be enabled to "choose the good part which shall never be taken from us:" may we "set our affections on things above," and "possess our souls in patience:" may we, under our lighter trials, after the example of Job, learn to repress every rebellious passion; to humble ourselves before God; to adore his wise and righteous sovereignty, and to praise him for remaining mercies and prospects: and may we learn by all our troubles, to get nearer to his mercy-seat, in communion with him. Then Satan will lose his aim, and not be able by affliction to prevail with us to sin, or "charge God foolishly." And may the malice and power of these our enemies render more precious to us that gracious and condescending Saviour, "who came to destroy the works of the devil," and who, in order to effect our salvation, was willing to suffer from that enemy, far more than Job suffered, or than we can possibly conceive!

NOTES.

CHAP. II. V. 1-3. (Notes, i. 6-19.) "To set themselves against JEHOVAH. (1.) Not merely to stand, but to set themselves as pillars: must not this mean in a rebellious and hostile manner." (E. Smith.) (Note, i. 6.) This bold alteration is grounded on the supposed meaning of the Hebrew word Hilghatseb. The reader may see how far this may be supported, by turning to the following texts, in which the very same word is found. (xxxviii. 14. Ex. xiv. 13. xix. 17. xxxiv. 5. Num. xi. 16. Deut. xxxi. 14. Josh. xxiv. 1. 2 Chr. xi. 13. xx. 6. 17.) It is used in either sense indiscriminately.—Still he, &c. Satan had been permitted to prove Job's sincerity, by the most overwhelming and sudden loss of his whole substance, and of all his children. But instead of *curse*ing, he blessed and worshipped God. Thus he held fast his integrity, and shewed the simplicity and piety of his heart. (Note, i. 20-22.) Satan had, "without cause," moved the Lord thus to afflict his servant; for there was not the least ground for the charge of selfishness which he had lodged against him; and nothing in Job's character rendered such severe afflictions necessary, either to preserve him from ruin, or to vindicate the honour of the Divine government: yet, doubtless, the Lord had wise and good reasons for his conduct; and Job, as a sinner, deserved worse than any temporal afflictions.—The word rendered destroy, signifies to swallow up; and may refer to Job's substance and family: but Satan aimed to destroy his soul also.—"But thou spakest to destroy his substance in vain." (Sept.)

V. 4, 5. Satan construed Job's gracious resignation into an evidence of his insensibility; as if he had been destitute of affection for his children, and regard for his servants. His life and health were preserved, and he would give any one's skin to preserve his own: he was willing therefore to compound, and part with all to save his life; so that he still kept up his religion, expecting that his other losses would be made up. Nothing could be more unreasonable and malignant than this insinuation; yet, it illustrates the subtlety of that enemy, who was able plausibly to put a bad construction on Job's most unexceptionable conduct, and to impute to the basest principles, what sprang from the noblest of which the human heart is susceptible.

V. 6. To prove the falsehood and malice of Satan's insinuation, God granted him permission to afflict Job in his body in any way he chose: only he was to "save his life." The word is often rendered soul, and probably means that he was to preserve to him the possession of his understanding; for if driven distracted, and in his frenzy blasphemed, it would not be a fair trial. (Notes, i. 9-12. Ps. lxxvi. 10. Luke xxii. 31-34.)

V. 7, 8. No doubt the disease, which Satan inflicted on Job, was as painful and loathsome as it could be made. Sore boils, or ulcers, (one of which is often found to exercise all our patience,) covered Job from head to foot; so that his excessive torture must have been incapable of relief from change of posture; and he would be so offensive that few would come near him. (Notes, Matt. viii. 28, 29. Luke xiii. 10-17. P. O. 10-21.) Being deprived of other relief, he took a potsherd to cleanse his sores; or perhaps when any of the boils began to die away, the itching became as intolerable, as the pain before had been; so that "he took a potsherd to scrape himself withal:" and by this improper treatment, it is likely, his disease was increased and prolonged, and one kind of misery alternately exchanged for another. (Notes, xxx. 15-31.)—"He also sat down among ashes:" the Septuagint renders it "upon a dunghill," and he is generally represented in that situation: the original, however, only means that he assumed the posture of a mourner and a suppliant. (Marg. Ref.)

9 ¶ Then said 'his wife unto him, Dost thou still retain thine integrity? "curse God, and die.

10 But he said unto her, "Thou speakest 'as one of the foolish women speaketh. What? 'shall we receive good at the hand of God, and shall we not receive evil? 'In all this did not Job sin with his lips.

11 ¶ Now when Job's three 'friends heard of all this evil that was come upon him, they came every one from his own place; Eliphaz the 'Temanite, and Bildad the 'Shuhite, and Zophar the Naamathite: for

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 9. When Satan deprived Job of his children, he reserved his wife to be his tempter; perhaps knowing her to be a woman of an impatient spirit, who had great influence with her husband. She had shared the former afflictions with him, yet it is probable that she was full of hard and rebellious thoughts, though she did not openly give vent to them. But when this additional calamity oppressed Job, she was driven to despair of help, and to upbraid him as preposterous in adhering to his religion, seeing God rewarded his fidelity and resignation with nothing but one dire calamity after another.—The meaning of her advice has been much disputed, for the Hebrew word signifies both to bless and to curse, (as the Latin word sacer means either sacred, or accursed.) (Note, i. 5.) But her counsel was evidently suggested by Satan, who spake by her, as by the serpent to Eve, and by Eve to Adam; and it was therefore coincident with his temptation; (Notes, Gen. iii. 1—6. P. O. 1—6.) and both her preface and Job's answer prove, that it was desperate, and not pious advice which she gave. Our translation therefore, probably, gives the true sense; and that, being driven desperate, she instigated Job to despair and blasphemy, to "curse God," though he died for so doing; or even in order to provoke him thus to terminate his sufferings; or as an introduction to suicide, to which Satan no doubt would tempt him.—It is well known, that the Gentiles, under great calamities, would frequently vent their rage, by curses against the gods, whom at other times they worshipped.

V. 10. Considering Job's situation, nothing can be more admirable than this reply. He reproved his wife with firmness, yet with temper; and neither the anguish of his mind, nor the baseness of her suggestion, dictated any opprobrious language. He did not even address her, as a foolish, or wicked woman, for he would not for one crime, however great, condemn her as a hypocrite. She spoke, indeed, "as one of the foolish women;" but he would hope it was the effect of violent temptation, and the exceeding distress of her heart; and that she would repent of this her heinous sin. "What," says he, in astonishment at her desperate language, "shall we receive good at the hand of God, and shall we not receive evil?" "Shall we, guilty, polluted, worthless creatures, receive so many unmerited blessings from a just and holy God; and shall we refuse to accept of the punishment of our sins, when we suffer so much less than we deserve, and are yet allowed to hope for a happy event? Rather let us receive the evil also, with patient submission, and even as a pledge of his love, and a means of our good."—Thus far he most honourably stood the trial, and appeared the brightest in the furnace of affliction: and the testimony here borne to his conduct, shews that he did not speak the language of passion, as many seem to think; but that of soberness and piety.—It is not said, what reception his reply met with; but the temptation was repulsed and the tempter baffled; and we read little more of his wife. (xix. 17.)

V. 11. The friends of Job seem to have been persons eminent for their rank in life, as well as for their wisdom and piety. The Septuagint calls them kings, but no evidence can be adduced, of this being the case. Eliphaz is supposed to have descended from Teman, the grandson of Esau, by Eliphaz, whose name this his descendant bore: (Gen. xxxvi. 11. 1 Chr. i. 35.) Bildad, from Shuah, Abraham's son by Keturah; (Gen. xxv. 3. 1 Chr. i. 32;) Zophar also sprang from some of the families, descended from Abraham. For true religion seems to have continued a considerable time in the different branches of that favoured family, even among those who were excluded from the covenant made with Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob.—These persons, having heard of Job's great affliction, made an appointment to go to visit him, and sympathize with him. Their intentions were humane, friendly, and pious; and they had doubtless been the associates of his religion in more prosperous days: yet, by their mistake of his case, they not only greatly increased his anguish; but unintentionally concurred with Satan, in tempting him to despair, and to blasphemy as its never failing effect.

V. 12, 13. Job seems to have been at this time in the open air; when his friends, astonished at what they saw, and perceiving him so altered that they could not know him, expressed their grief by every emphatical token, and burst out into loud lamentations. It should not, however, be concluded from the language here used, that he and his friends remained together in the same place, all the time preceding their debate, and during its continuance. At proper seasons they came to Job, and sat by him as mourners; but they were so affected by a view of his misery, that they remained silent before him. It is probable, they suspected that his unprecedented calamities were judgments on him for some enormous crimes, which he had veiled under a hypocritical profession of religion; but they did not choose to augment his grief, by abruptly bringing this charge against him; yet, they could not use the ordinary topics of consolation. Perhaps they conferred among themselves on the subject, and agreed to wait and observe his conduct, and to take an opportunity of speaking, as circumstances might appear to them. Perhaps also Job suspected the cause of their silence; and his anguish on that account, might give Satan an occasion of tempting him to use the passionate language recorded in the ensuing chapter, which confirmed his friends in their harsh suspicions, and gave rise to the subsequent debate.

V. 1—8. Holy angels are not more unwearied in serving God, and in doing good, than evil spirits are in rebellion and mischief; and when baffled in their attempts, they are pushed on, by pride and enmity, to still further disappointment and disgrace.—As Satan persists in accusing the people of God, notwithstanding the evidences which they give of piety and integrity; so will his servants upon earth persist in slandering them, in defiance of demonstration itself. From "their father" they learn to put a bad construction upon their best actions, and to ascribe them to base motives. (Notes, John vii. 37—47.) The piety of believers is called hypocrisy; their self-denial, affectation; their liberality, ostentation; their resignation, want of natural affection; their meekness, want of spirit; and their contempt of worldly pleasure, and dislike to trifling and profane company, are ascribed to want of taste, and a morose unsocial disposition. But the Lord will vindicate the character of his servants: yet he delights in their constancy and submission amidst trials and temptations, because they glorify the power of his grace. He will, therefore, at some times, without any other peculiar cause, give their enemies permission to prove them in various ways. They mean to destroy them; but he intends to purify their hearts, to exalt their graces, and to enhance their glorious recompense: and, though the trial may be severe; yet it is the post of honour, and the event will be unspeakably happy. (Notes, Gen. i. 20. Is. x. 7. Hab. i. 12—17. Rom. viii. 35—39. 1 Pet. iv. 12—16.)—The insinuations of Satan and his factors are most dangerous, when most plausible, and when they are sophistical inferences from undoubted truths. Men are indeed naturally selfish, and prone to disregard all others in comparison of themselves, their own ease, interest, or indulgence. Hence it is evident we all need an inward, and gracious change, that we may learn to love God and our neighbour: and as men will give all they have to save their lives; we should argue, that it is true wisdom to part with our property, or liberty, or country; nay, with our very lives, to secure the salvation of our immortal souls. But to infer, that all men are alike mercenary; and that the most excellent actions of pious persons spring from the same carnal and selfish principles, as the most atrocious crimes of the profane; manifests the malice of Satan himself, tends to render the vilest characters contented in their wickedness, subverts the cause of infidelity, and insinuates that all religion is grimace and imposture. Yet, who does not often hear such suggestions, from those who would not be thought to stand forth as the avowed advocates of impiety or atheism? To confute such accusations by stubborn facts, the Lord is pleased to give leave to malice to exert her utmost power, in putting this matter to the trial: in the midst of afflictions and persecutions he enables the believer to retain his integrity: and while the men of the world give up honour, conscience, and their souls, to save their lives; the servant of God renounces all, and even lays down his life, rather than disobey and dishonour his Lord. Thus, in innumerable instances, have the patient and constant sufferings of godly men confounded, rather than gratified, the malice of their slanderous persecutors; and proved to a demonstration an essential difference betwixt those, who are only "born of the flesh," and those who "are born again of the Spirit."—We cannot know how far the Lord, in his unsearchable counsels, may see fit to suffer our enemies to prevail. They may be permitted, not only to tear from us all earthly comforts, and to fill our bodies and souls with most exquisite agony, but even to seduce our beloved friends to become our tempters, or accusers; we should therefore stand prepared for trials, and "rejoice with trembling" in every external advantage.—When we are most healthy and vigorous, we should remember to what loathsome diseases our bodies are liable, and that they may shortly become a mass of putrefaction, which could scarcely be known or endured by our most affectionate friends. Instead then of being vain of them, or bestowing pains in decorating, or pampering them; let us seek for the incorruptible ornaments and unfading beauties of holiness. Let us be thankful for our present measure of health, or the attendance which we receive in sickness; and let us look, through the grave, to the risen and glorified Jesus, and expect his second coming, when "He shall change our vile bodies, that they may be fashioned like unto his glorious body, according to the working, whereby he is able even to subdue all things unto himself."—In humiliating circumstances, a humble deportment should be observed; and when we are in great pain and sickness, deserted, insulted, destitute of necessities, or convenient attendance, or labouring under a complication of every distress; we should meditate on the sufferings of Job, on his patience, on the love of God to him, and on his happy deliverance; and we should also look unto the suffering Saviour, and compare our light afflictions with his unknown sufferings, "lest we be wearied and faint in our minds." (Notes, Heb. xii. 2, 3. Jam. v. 7—11.)

V. 9—13. The temporal comforts reserved to us, when others are removed, often prove the sources of our severest anguish. The enemy knows how to suit his temptations to our circumstances, and to send them by those persons that possess the most influence over us: we should then consider, not who proposes, but what is proposed to us. (Note, Matt. xvi. 21—23. P. O. 21—28.)—No temptation is so dangerous to the afflicted, as that of despair. When a man is induced to regard God as an irreconcilable enemy, his heart naturally rises in enmity, and vents this in blasphemy; every means of grace is neglected, any crime ventured on with eagerness, and suicide may probably close the horrid career. Let us then "watch and pray, that we enter not into temptation." (Notes, 1 Sam. xxviii. 12—25. xxxi. 3—5. Matt. xxvii. 3—5. 2 Cor. ii. 5—11.) —We ought not to judge of the Lord's love to us, by outward events or present feelings, but should rest our hopes upon his holy word; and consider every hard thought of God, as a "fiery dart" of the enemy, which must be quenched without a moment's delay, by whatever means it may have been excited. It is also desirable, to possess our souls in meekness, and to answer even our tempters with calmness and reason, as well as with decided abhorrence of sin.—None, but the foolish, will habitually say, that there is no hope in God, nor any benefit in serving him: none, but the ungodly, can deliberately persuade us to despair, blasphemy, or self-murder. But if any one who has appeared to be a pious Christian, should once, under urgent distresses, drop a hint which tends to such conclusions; we should remind him, whose work he is doing, and whose language he speaks.—Did we duly remember our sins against God, we should not wonder, that amidst our many blessings, we had also heavy afflictions; we should rather say, "It is of the Lord's mercies that we are not consumed;" and receive the severest of them with thankfulness as well as patience: and thus they would become our richest gain.—Those friends, who crush the afflicted believer with hard censures and suspicions, are as real tempters, as those who persuade him to blasphemy and apostasy.—It is an indispensable duty of the Christian to visit and comfort his afflicted brethren, as he hath opportunity; for it is equally useful to him, as to them: and the greatest as well as the meanest should attend upon it, without shrinking from inconveniences, or disagreeables. But, alas! we often prove miserable comforters of each other, augmenting, instead of alleviating one another's grief. So that, our whole dependence for consolation must be placed on God alone.

NOTES.

CHAP. III. V. 1. Here the style of the book is changed to poetry, which is adorned by bold figures, according to the genius of the East. For seven days Job's friends had come, and sat by him, without speaking either consolation to him, or mentioning their suspicions: but doubtless their distant and reserved behaviour increased his inward anguish. At the same time, we may suppose, that Satan assaulted his mind with all possible temptations, to fill him with hard thoughts of God, as if he were severe, unjust, and his enemy; to shake his confidence and hope; and, by filling him with horror and dismay, to urge him to "curse God to his face." His permission seems to have extended to this, as well as to the torturing of his body; provided he did not kill him, or deprive him of reason.—In this, Job was an especial type of Christ, whose inward sufferings, both in the garden and on the cross, are generally allowed to have been far the most dreadful, and in a great degree occasioned by the assaults of the devil in that hour of darkness: (Notes, Matt. xxvi. 36—39. Luke xxii. 39—53:) and when Job's trial was come to its extremity, we may conclude, that he was deprived of all comfortable sense of God's favour, and filled with dread of his wrath. Unless we bring these inward trials into the account, we shall not readily comprehend the change which took place in his conduct, from the entire resignation of the preceding chapters, to the impatience which appears here, and in the subsequent part of the book. But this consideration solves the difficulty: Job's inward conflict and anguish, added to all his outward sufferings, caused indwelling sin to work powerfully, and at length it burst forth in many improper expressions. He had long repressed the thoughts of his heart: but at last "he opened his mouth;" not to utter wise instructions, deliberately and gravely, (according to the general import of that expression, Marg. Ref) but bitter execrations upon the day of his birth. For he vainly hoped to ease his mind by giving vent to the fire which burned within.—The experienced believer, however, (who knows that a few drops of this bitter cup are more dreadful than the sharpest afflictions, when preserved from inward temptation, and favoured with the sweet sense of the love and presence of God,) will not be much surprised, to find that Job proved himself a man of like passions with others, and prone to folly and impatience: but he will rejoice to find that Satan was disappointed, and could not prove him a hypocrite; for though he cursed the day of his birth, he did not curse his God. (Note, i. 9—11.)

V. 2—10. Here we find Job giving utterance to his anguish, by a variety of curses on the day of his birth, (which is generally celebrated with joy;) because he would thus declare a vain wish that he had never been born. He would have the day and night, on which he was born, to the joy of his parents, expunged from the year; or at least to be one continued and dreary night. He would have it marked with tokens of God's abhorrence, and by every terrifying appearance; that men might dread its approach, spend it in solitude, and rejoice when it was over: even such a season, as the Egyptians experienced during the plague of darkness. (Notes, Ez. x. 20—23. Ps. lxxviii. 49.) He would have it cursed by those, who superstitiously marked certain days as ominous; and employed in wallings, by those who were engaged to mourn at funerals; or, as some interpret it, spent in horrid incantations, by those who dealt with Satan, and brought him up by their witchcrafts: for, the original is literally, "those who are ready to raise up Leviathan." (Note, Is. xxvii. 1.) And all this, because the day did not prevent his being born, and, by making his mother's womb his grave, preserve him from his present misery. (Note, Jer. xx. 14—18.)—The wildness, absurdity, and impossibility, of these wishes denote the tempest of his soul: the cruelty to his mother, whose miserable death should, as he thought, have prevented his wretched life; and the ill-will to mankind, to whom he would bequeath such a dreadful day, may properly be noticed: but such exclamations, being the language of passion, cannot be measured by the standard of reason. They imply, however, an ungrateful contempt of God's gifts, and rebellion against his will; and are utterly unbecoming a sinner under a dispensation of mercy, or a believer in a state of grace. But during inward darkness and temptation, Satan so stirs up the corruption of the heart, that the plainest truths and promises are forgotten; former and present mercies are disregarded; future prospects are clouded; and the soul verges to despondency and blasphemy: yet is held back by the counteracting efficacy of divine grace, which subsists and operates, though it does not decidedly prevail; thus the more dreadful effects are prevented, and in time the soul recovers its composure. (Note, Gal. v. 16—18.)—Doubtless, Job was afterwards heartily ashamed of this language: but what must his judgment of it be now, in the full enjoyment of unchangeable felicity! Does he now curse the day of his birth? Does he now wish that he had never been born? His own reproach of his wife belonged also to himself, though not in the same degree: for on this occasion he spake, as "one of the foolish men speak." (Note, ii. 10,) and thus confirmed his friends in their unfavourable opinion of him.

V. 11—19. When Job had exhausted his rhetoric in cursing the day of his birth, he next enquired, Why he did not die as soon as he was born? and thus he not only murmured against God for sparing his life; but expostulated with those who were present at his birth, as if now before him, for their tender attention to him in that helpless state! for had none nursed and suckled him, when a new-born infant, he should not have lived to endure his present sufferings. The event of his afflictions, to himself, and to the church, through successive ages, fully resolves his questions, and shews for what important purposes he was preserved. But under this temptation, he thought of nothing but relief from anguish and distress: he knew that in the grave no pain was felt, and, for the moment, he scarcely looked any further; though in more lucid intervals, he expressed a faith and hope concerning the eternal world. (Notes, xiv. 7—12. xix. 23—27.) His present misery made him, at the time, think insensibility most desirable: and he amused himself with imagining, that if he had died from the womb, he should have lain as quiet in the grave, as the most mighty monarchs, conquerors, or politicians; or, as the most wealthy princes, who retained nothing of their acquisitions but a desolate tomb, and were not a whit superior to a still-born infant: there he considered labourers, prisoners, and slaves, as rescued from their oppressors, free as their masters, and at rest from their labour and pain. His words indeed contain important truths: but if exemption from present suffering were all that can be expected, there would be little reason to look forward to death with comfort, or to want deliverance from the sorrows of this present life.—Built desolate, &c. (14.) Many explain this of the sepulchres, which princes and nobles often built for themselves. (Notes, Is. xlii. 16. Matt. xxvii. 57—61.)

V. 20—23. Finding the vanity of his impossible wishes, Job next complained that he was still forced to live, though weary of life: and he enquired the reason, why light, that is, life, was given to the miserable? He did not mention the name of God, perhaps out of reverence to him, for his better judgment checked the vehemence of his passion; but he evidently reflected upon him as unkind, in not at once terminating his sufferings by death. He dared not rush uncalled into the presence of his Judge, by an act of desperate rebellion and murder, (Notes, ii. 9, 10;) but he should exceedingly rejoice, if the Lord would cut him off, and be more glad of a grave than of hid treasures; and he supposed that many others were of the same judgment. (Note, vi. 9—13.) He could not conceive, that any good end could be answered by the continuance of his life: for every thing in providence, and in the frame of his mind, was so dark and dismal, that he was like a man who had lost his way, or who was so inclosed by powerful enemies on every side, that he had no prospect of escape.—The tempter seems to have kept the thought of the eternal world from his mind: but the event fully shewed, why the Lord continued his life, both for his own good, and for that of millions.

V. 24—27. By way of apology for his vehement complaints, Job at length mentioned the excess of his sufferings. Nothing but sighs and groans occupied his time: his very food, which prolonged his miserable life, was mingled with groans, and even roarings, (Notes, Ps. xxii. 1. xxxii. 3—5.) and they flowed forth incessantly, like waters from a fountain. He was, however, conscious, that in prosperity he had not indulged carnal security; he had feared a change, and watched against those sins, in himself and his family, which might provoke the Divine displeasure; (Note, i. 5:) yet his solicitude had not prevented his calamities, which equalled the worst of his fears.—His former expectation of trials, and preparation for them, should have been a comfort to him under his sufferings: but, through the power of Satan and the prevalence of corruption, this seemed an aggravation of his misery. (Note, xxvii. 7—10.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—10. There is an essential difference between the true believer, and every hypocrite; and the former will not finally apostatize or despair: yet under urgent troubles and temptations, the evil of the heart frequently bursts forth in very culpable words and actions. None but the Saviour ever endured the extremity of anguish and temptation, without any abatement of his love, any mixture of sin, or any indications of impatience.—The pious reader will doubtless recollect seasons when, under afflictions comparatively light, his heart hath risen into the same kind of peevishness, ingratitude, rebellion, and despondency, which Job discovered. Many will with shame remember, that they have conceived and uttered rash and foolish wishes not wholly dissimilar to those of Job: nay, some will be conscious, that half the burden which was laid on Job would have extorted from them still more desperate complaints; and these reflections should lay us low in humiliation before God. We should also take shame to ourselves, when we consider the folly and impossibility of those things, for which we have often wished. In our sober moments we should meditate on the consequences which would have resulted, had our vain and impatient wishes been granted, to ourselves, our relatives, and our neighbours; and we shall often find that they were unnatural and cruel, as well as impious, and destructive to our own happiness. Indeed, the habit of wishing is altogether foolish and sinful. Those wishes, which respect the past, can only express our impatience: and if the object of our desires at the present, or for the future, be lawful, we should make it the subject of our prayers; if not, we should silence ourselves and the tempter, by saying, "It is written, Thou shalt not covet."—When our passions overpower reason, the soul becomes as a ship in a violent storm, without compass, rudder, or pilot; and, if it be possible, we ought to cast anchor till the storm subsides. Profound silence, interrupted only by ejaculations, should be observed: as we can in such a case do no good, but must get harm, by either speaking or acting; though we shall naturally be very earnest in both.—Indeed, we are born in sin, and to sorrow; and, if left to ourselves and the tendency of our own corruptions, without remedy or mercy, it would "have been better for us never to have been born;" yet even in that case it would be diabolical rage and enmity, to charge our guilt and misery upon God, from whom "every good and perfect gift," and nothing else, can proceed. But blessed be his name! even "the earth is full of his goodness." This present life may be made very tolerable, if we accommodate ourselves to our circumstances, and attend to our duty: and we

CHAP. IV.

Eliphaz reproves Job for impatience, and want of confidence in God, 1—6. He states that divine judgments come not on the righteous, but on the wicked, 7—11. He relates his vision, confirming this doctrine, 12—21.

THEN "Eliphaz the Temanite answered and said, 2 If we essay *to commune with thee, 'wilt thou be grieved? but who can 'withhold himself from speaking?

3 Behold, 'thou hast instructed many, and 'thou hast strengthened the weak hands.

are under a dispensation of mercy, and may hope for the favour of God and eternal felicity, whatever our former lives have been, if now willing to accept of Jesus Christ, as our Saviour from wrath and from sin. By "giving diligence to make our calling and election sure," we may obtain good evidence that we are born of God; and his children are heirs of everlasting glory. In that case we certainly can have no cause to "curse the day of our birth;" and if a thought of that kind intrude, we should treat it as a temptation of the enemy, and reject it immediately.—But what a day, or rather what an eternal night, will that be which awaits impenitent sinners! Condemned to outer darkness, where is weeping and gnashing of teeth; banished for ever from the favour and presence of God; surrounded with horror and despair; employed in curses and imprecations; wearied of existence, and in vain longing for annihilation; and associated with the devil and his angels! That day God will not regard from above, no light will shine upon it for ever. Who then can help feeling the propriety, yea, the necessity, of praying, "From this destruction, good Lord, deliver us!" May all, who read these remarks, take warning "to flee from the wrath to come, and lay hold for refuge on the hope set before us" in the gospel!

V. 11—26. If, in this accepted time and day of salvation, we, in good earnest, seek and serve God, we may regard the formation of our bodies, the gift of our immortal souls, the care taken of us in infancy and childhood, and all the Lord's protection of us and long-suffering towards us ever since, as intended, that we may be for ever happy. Then indeed we may well cease to envy kings or princes, and all the wise and wealthy of the world; who will soon be levelled in the grave, with the infant which died from the womb, but who will have an awful account to render of their stewardship, before the tribunal of God. (Notes, Luke xvi. 1—13. P. O. 1—12.) We should indeed habituate ourselves to view the grave without terror: for we shall there feel no pain or uneasiness, and be out of the reach of every oppressor and persecutor. But "there remaineth a better rest for the people of God;" a rest from sin, temptation, and conflict, and from sorrows and labours, in the immediate presence and ineffable enjoyment of God. Thence both wicked men and evil spirits will be excluded, and cease from troubling us for ever: "there the weary will indeed be at rest," and the poor slave and prisoner enjoy the glorious liberty of the children of God." Nay, as far as we trust and obey the Lord Jesus, we here find rest to our souls; though in the world we have tribulation. It is indeed far "better to depart, and to be with him;" but we must not undervalue life, though spent in sufferings; seeing they will work for our good at last, and some way or other subserve his glory and the good of our brethren. Let us then learn to keep the eternal world more constantly in view; that we may not be much disconcerted about temporal things.—And should any take up these pages, who are longing for death, and tempted to suicide; let them compare their present sufferings, not with the quiet of the grave, but with the scriptural declarations of the state of the damned; which must be the lot of all, who die in rebellion and despair, and by an act of deliberate murder. (Note, Ex. xx. 13. Conclusion.) Let them remember that this desperation is the suggestion of the old liar and "murderer from the beginning;" the very object at which he aimed, in respect of Job, by all his temptations. Let them stop their ears to his suggestions, and hearken to the Saviour's inviting voice, and come to him with their burdens and sorrows, and they shall find rest to their souls, and learn to bless God for temporal life as the means of eternal salvation.—Finally, in prosperity let us all watch against carnal security; and under trials let us pray for patience: looking to him, "who suffered being tempted, that he might be able to succour them that are tempted." Then, though our way seem stopt, and our hope lost, for a season; we shall ere long be enabled to declare, from our own experience, that "they who wait for the Lord shall never be ashamed."

NOTES.

CHAP. IV. V. 1. It is probable, that Job's friends had previously conferred upon his case; and suspected, from his extraordinary sufferings and impatient wishes, that he was a wicked man: they therefore thought it incumbent upon them to charge this home on his conscience, in order to induce him to repentance; and Eliphaz, who seems to have been the senior, or superior, of them, undertook to open the matter to him. (Note, ii. 12, 13.)—Thus, when Satan failed of proving his charge against Job, he suggested to his friends this suspicion of his hypocrisy, that they might grieve and tempt him by it. For the argument, between Job and his friends, was precisely on the same point, which, at Satan's instigation, was to be decided by his behaviour under affliction; namely, whether he was a truly pious man, or a hypocrite. Satan undertook to prove him a hypocrite by afflicting him; and his friends concluded him one because he was afflicted, and shewed impatience under his extreme sufferings. This we must keep continually in mind, if we would clearly understand the ensuing debate. (Notes, Luke xiii. 1—5.)

V. 2. Eliphaz introduced his discourse with apparent modesty: yet the abrupt manner, in which he addressed Job, shewed that he was about to censure and reprove him. He purposed to converse with Job on the subject of his extraordinary sufferings, and his despondency under them; but he was afraid he would be grieved at his words. The case, however, was urgent: for who, in such circumstances, "could refrain from words?" (Marg.) This intimated that he thought Job extremely culpable, nay, in danger of final destruction.

V. 3—6. It seems that Job had possessed a singular talent of giving seasonable counsel, and encouragement, as circumstances required. He knew how, by animating exhortations, to strengthen and comfort the desponding, that with renewed alacrity they might resume their work. He was also capable of giving suitable cautions to those, who were ready to fall into sin, and to excite them to resist the temptation. And he had assiduously improved his talent; thus becoming a blessing to many. (Notes, xxix. 7—17. Prov. x. 21. xv. 4, 7. 23. xxv. 11, 12. Is. xxxv. 3, 4.) This Eliphaz allowed; and, along with due commendation, he might very properly have given Job a plain, but gentle, reproof, for his present impatience, and for seeming to abandon all hope. But his application of it was too harsh, and more suited to dishearten, and even exasperate, one in Job's situation, than to convince and humble him. He certainly made much too light of Job's afflictions, as if not much greater than those, under which he had comforted others. "It is come upon thee." "It toucheth thee." He seems to have also spoken too strongly of Job's impatience. He indeed bitterly complained, and uttered many vain and rebellious wishes: but he did not faint; for then he would have yielded to Satan's temptation, and followed the counsel of his wife. (Notes, i. 9, 10.) And in the question Eliphaz proposes, "Is this thy fear, &c.?" he appears to have expressed himself in a manner suited to give Job the idea, that he considered his former reputation for piety, confidence in God, and integrity of life, as unmerited; seeing he had now cast off all reverence of God, and hope in his mercy; and had broken out into the language of despair and rebellion. (Notes, Prov. xxiv. 10. Rom. ii. 17—24. Heb. xii. 2—8.)—Some indeed think, that he only meant to expostulate with him on the inconsistency of his conduct; and to exhort him to reduce to practice the counsel, which he had given others; and in this emergency to support the character that he had before acquired, but was now in danger of forfeiting: but the language employed, and the subsequent speeches of him and his friends, do not favour this interpretation.

V. 7—11. Most expositors suppose, that Eliphaz intended, in this passage, to bring a direct charge of hypocrisy and iniquity against Job; which he had only insinuated in the preceding verses. "Eliphaz, incensed at the complaint of Job, instead of condoling with him, and pitying the miseries, which had put him into his agony, and applying fit lenitives to his anguish, bluntly rebukes him for not following the good advice he had given to others in their adversity: and tells him he had reason to suspect his piety, because the innocent were not wont to suffer such things; but only wicked oppressors, whom, though never so mighty, God had always humbled." (Bp. Patrick.)—"Is not this thy storming and fretting at the hand of God a plain argument, that all thy religion, or pretended fear of God, was only upon a confidence that he would still bless and prosper thee?—I have seen and observed that men speed according to their actions, and reap the fruit of their evil doings, in evil sufferings." (Bp. Hall.) Some, however, think, that he did not mean to decide on his character, though his language was harsh, and implied strong suspicions; but to shew him, that, if he was not a wicked man, he had no occasion to despond, as the innocent and righteous were never left to perish; and, indeed, the counsel he afterwards gives favours this interpretation. (v. 8, 17, 18.)—By "innocent," and "righteous," Eliphaz meant believers, godly men, in opposition to the profane or hypocritical. But his questions seem to imply that no such persons ever were cut off by sudden judgments, so as to perish even in this world: and thus the restoration of Job to health and prosperity, was made the test of his sincerity, or hypocrisy! Doubtless, the righteous never finally and eternally perish: but righteous Abel had been slain by wicked Cain, and many godly men had been greatly afflicted in this world; so that his general rule admitted of numerous exceptions. (Notes, ix. 22—24. xviii. 1—12. xxvii. 13—23. Gen. iv. 6—9. Ps. lxxiii. 2—14. Eccl. ix. 1—3. Jer. xii. 1—4. Ez. xxi. 2—5.)—It is indeed often seen "that they who plow iniquity and sow wickedness;" that is, who labour to be rich and great by fraud, oppression, and iniquity, meet with a recompense in this world: the breath, or anger, of the Lord blasting all their prosperity, and consuming all their substance. And though they have been strong, courageous, and fierce as lions; yet they have been strangely defeated of their aim, and brought to ruin with their posterity, whom they sought to exalt by cruelty and rapine. But it is not always so; nor are they the only persons who meet with grievous calamities in this life: and therefore it was uncandid to insinuate, without any proof, (as Eliphaz evidently did, though in figurative language,) that Job got his wealth by wickedness; and was spoiled of it, and bereaved of his children, by the just judgment of God upon him. (Notes, viii. 4—7. xviii. 5—21. Ps. lvii. 4. Ez. xix. 2—9. xxii. 7.)

V. 12—16. Before there was any written word of God, believers received their knowledge in divine things, either by tradition, or immediate revelation: and there is reason to conclude, that, when necessary, they were generally directed in the latter way, either personally, or by their brethren. (Note, xxxiii. 14—18. Marg. Ref.) Accordingly, Eliphaz, perhaps while meditating on the case of Job, had a remarkable vision, which he supposed to be a divine confirmation of his doctrine: for the instruction was brought to him unexpectedly, and seemed apposite to the present case, as far as he was enabled to receive it.—When musing in retirement on various subjects, or on former visions with which he had been favoured, at a time when others were asleep; he was suddenly seized with excessive consternation and amazement at what he saw and heard; for a spirit, or angel, passing before him, stood still in his presence. He could not indeed describe what he had seen; but he remembered the words which were distinctly uttered, amidst the silence of the night.—It is observable that the very idea of appearances, from the world of spirits, is terrifying to the heart of fallen man: sin hath broken off our original communication with it; and we instinctively dread evil from that quarter.

V. 17—21. These verses seem to contain the precise words of the spirit who appeared to Eliphaz.—If God should punish those who did not deserve it, the innocent sufferer would be more just than his Judge, and man would be more pure, or free from blame, than his Maker. Some render it, "just before God;" but that is differently expressed. (ix. 2. xxv. 4. Heb.) (Note, xxxii. 2—5.) And, as this supposition would be blasphemy, it must be allowed, even when we cannot perceive it, that every one deserves all that he does, or shall suffer, on earth or in hell. It is therefore evidently very wrong to complain under afflictions, as if we were unjustly dealt with; or to justify our whole conduct before God, who hath condemned us as sinners; and, on this ground, Eliphaz might fairly have reproved Job's impatience; and exhorted him to submit to the justice, and hope in the mercy, of God, under his sufferings. Again, he was shewn, that God put no trust in any of his servants, but even "charged his angels with folly." Though glorious and holy creatures, they are fallible and mutable, except as upheld and confirmed by the Lord. They execute his wise and righteous counsels; but would soon shew their want of wisdom, if trusted to manage any part of the government of the world according to their own mind. Nay, compared with the infinite knowledge and wisdom of God, they are chargeable with ignorance, being utterly unable to comprehend the vast designs of the great Creator and Lord of the universe; except as he pleases to unfold them. How much less, then, may man be trusted! How much more may he be charged with ignorance and folly! He dwells imprisoned in a body of clay, chained to the earth from whence it was taken, and to which it must soon return; as a poor cottage which is mouldering to the mean materials of which it is built, and about to mingle with the dust on which it has its foundation. (Note, 2 Cor. v. 1—4.) The feebleness of mankind should also be considered: they may be crushed as easily as a moth, or destroyed by the meanest insect; the destruction of the species is perpetual; men perish from the earth for ever, without any one greatly noticing so common an event. Then all their excellency vanisheth, and they die without having had time to make much observation, or acquire extensive knowledge, compared with that of other intelligent beings; and very commonly without being made "wise unto salvation." And shall such creatures presume to fathom the mysteries of Providence, to arraign the appointments of God, to charge him with injustice, or to venture an opinion on subjects, of which they can know little or nothing!—The vision was full of instruction; but the use Eliphaz seemed disposed to make of it, was contrary to its leading design. Instead of condemning Job because of his sufferings, he should have inferred, that he and his friends were incompetent to decide upon the case, or to understand the deep designs of God in this mysterious dispensation.—He put no trust, &c. (18.) 'If not in his servants he will confide, and not even to his angels he will ascribe praise; how much less, &c.' (Ev. Mag. 1809, Dec. 498.) As the word rendered folly, differently pointed, is generally translated praise, perhaps this might be supported.

He recommends seeking to God in affliction, by declaring his power and wonderful works, 8-16. He speaks of the benefit of correction; and the privileges of those who duly improve it, 17-27.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1-11. We ought not needlessly to grieve the affliction: yet, if we wisely love them, we cannot refrain from speaking those things, which we judge conducive to the good of their souls. In attempting this, however, we should aim to unite tenderness with faithfulness.—Just commendations excellently introduce needful reproofs, by preparing the mind to receive them as the result of love, and as forming a striking contrast between different parts of a man's behaviour. But if the application is overcharged; if that is imputed to impiety which springs from infirmity, it will lose its effect. It requires therefore much heavenly wisdom, to instruct, encourage, and reprove those who are tempted and perplexed; who have fallen into sins or sufferings; and who are ready to faint, or turn aside, or yield to despondency, through disappointments and discouraging trials. They who possess gifts suited to this work, should be diligent in it, as they have opportunity, whatever be their circumstances or avocations; and the communication from the treasure of wisdom and knowledge, which God hath committed to some, for the instruction and consolation of many, is at least as useful and acceptable, as the wealth that is bestowed in providing for the destitute. Yet it is more easy to counsel than to practise: and we all find, that our own arguments, encouragements, and exhortations to others, are insufficient to calm and support our own souls, in seasons of darkness and distress. It behoves us therefore to watch and pray, that we may not by our conduct defeat the effect of our instructions, and expose ourselves and the truths of God to reproach and contempt. For, men will expect from us in proportion to our profession; and make fewer allowances for those who have instructed many, than for others.—Even pious friends will not always enter into our feelings, under distresses and temptations; but will count that a touch, which we feel as a mortal wound; and our infirmities may give occasion to those of our brethren, whom we most love, to suspect and censure us as hypocrites. This is one of the sharpest trials that can befall a true believer; but we should prepare to meet it. The best are fallible, and often defective in judgment and tenderness; Satan can easily poison their minds with suspicions, and the Lord may permit it for our humiliation. When this is the case, all apparent good in a man's conduct will be ascribed to corrupt motives; and all that is evil aggravated: an irreverent expression, dictated by sudden passion, will be deemed a deliberate "casting off the fear of God;" an angry word will be termed revenge or hatred; a desponding wish will be construed into rebellion and despair; and the apparent uprightness, and professed hope in God, maintained for years, will be at once considered as presumption, selfishness, or hypocrisy. We should surely be very cautious not to concur with Satan, in thus "accusing our brethren," and urging them to renounce their confidence in God. But if it be our trial to be thus suspected and condemned, we need not wonder; better men than we, have been so treated; and if we are conscious of sincerity in the midst of our infirmities, the Lord will at length plead our cause, and "make out righteousness as the noon-day." (Notes, xxiii. 8-12. Ps. xxxvii. 5-8.)—Our most dangerous mistakes are occasioned by our deducing false inferences from undeniable truth. It is certain that none ever perished being innocent; that no godly person was ever finally miserable, no impenitent sinner finally happy; that according as a man sows, so shall he reap; (Note, Gal. vi. 7, 8;) and that many tyrants and oppressors, and their posterity, have been wonderfully destroyed. But it is equally true that many righteous men are heavily afflicted through life, and are suddenly cut off, and taken to heaven: while numbers of the wicked live long and prosper, die in outward peace, and leave their riches to their children: being "themselves reserved to the day of judgment to be punished." It is therefore as absurd to judge of a man's character by his outward circumstances; as to decide upon it from one single action which is contrary to the general tenor of his life.

V. 12-21. The written word of God speaks to us without those terrifying circumstances, which would attend an immediate communication with the world of spirits, and which even faith and communion with God would not enable us entirely to overcome: and we can review it from day to day, that we may fully receive the instruction contained in it. We may therefore be thankful for this method of knowing the will of God; nor should we regret that we may not expect immediate revelation, and do not witness those wonders which holy men of old did. Yet the knowledge of divine truth is of such vast importance, that no terror could counterbalance the advantage of it; and they who lay aside their Bibles, or forsake the preaching of the gospel, because they make them tremble at the prospect of their guilt and danger, seem to think it better to feel than to fear the wrath of God.—Retirement is favourable to our intercourse with heaven; and though we must now judge of every thing by the Scriptures; yet if a dream suggest a profitable hint, we should receive it with gratitude. Assuredly, were our hearts more holy, both our waking and sleeping thoughts would be more pure and heavenly.—Revelation from God is not intended to satisfy curiosity, but to excite our attention to those truths and duties, which before we knew not, or neglected. Among other important lessons, we are peculiarly concerned to understand the scriptural declarations of the infinite majesty, wisdom, justice, and goodness of God; of the comparative ignorance, meanness, and weakness of the most exalted creatures; and of the guilt, pollution, folly, and frailty of fallen man; the shortness of his continuance here, and the future consequences of his conduct in this world. These truths, if well digested, will cause us to adore with profound reverence the glorious Lord of all, and to abase ourselves in the dust before him. We shall then learn to cease from all dependence on our own wisdom, strength, and righteousness, and become calm and resigned under afflictions: our objections and excuses will be silenced, and we shall be teachable and simple as little children; disposed gladly to trust the Lord's mercy, to accept of his salvation, to yield ourselves to his will, to take the place and do the work assigned us, to prepare for death and judgment; and not to meddle with those deep matters, which are out of our reach, and beyond our scanty comprehension. But for want of this knowledge, how daringly do men impeach the wisdom, justice, and goodness of God! How do they object, murmur, justify themselves, quarrel with Providence, and reject, or explain away, the truths and precepts of revelation; as if they were more wise, righteous, and holy than their Maker! Yet it would be presumption in an archangel, to deem himself competent to decide on the propriety of God's unfathomable counsels, or to comprehend his vast designs; much more to find fault with his dispensations, and to dictate what it is right for him to do. "He putteth no trust in his angels," and, instead of making them his counsellors, or submitting his conduct to their judgment, he charges them with folly. How awful then is the pride and presumption of man! How great the patience of God!—But let us leave the infidel and the proud reasoner to dispute against their Maker; and the men of the world to heap up their treasures, and obtain those supposed excellencies, or to climb those eminences, from which death will soon hurry them, and they perish for ever, and die without wisdom, while scarcely any duly regard it. And let us consider, what we are, where we are, and whither we are going, and act accordingly; that when our houses of clay fall into the dust, our souls, having obtained true wisdom in the knowledge and experience of God's salvation, and the excellency of holiness, may ascend to the world of angels, and "the spirits of just men made perfect:" and there at the fountain-head, satisfy without danger our appetite for knowledge, by contemplating the works and perfections of God, with unceasing delight, and with further discoveries of his glory through the countless ages of eternity.

NOTES.

CHAP. V. V. 1. Call now, &c. Eliphaz here challenges Job to refute his arguments, or the doctrine of his vision, by the example or opinion of any of the saints and servants of God. Let him call forth His evidence, who might answer for him in this cause; but to what saint, who ever lived on earth, would he appeal? Had any of them been so visited by divine judgments, or behaved so rebelliously under affliction?—'Nay, if an angel should appear to thee, (says Eliphaz,) as one did to me, thou wouldst have no other information but this.' (Bp. Patrick.)

V. 2. The wrath and jealousy, or indignation of God, bring destruction on foolish and wicked men, and not on the righteous. Or, perhaps Eliphaz, perceiving Job to be greatly agitated by his discourse, intimated that his wrath, envy, and fretfulness, would only increase his torment and shorten his days, as they often produced these effects on foolish and wicked men. (Notes, xviii. 2-4. Jon. iv. 9-11. Marg. Ref.)

V. 3-5. In these verses, Eliphaz declared the result of his former observations. He had seen wicked men, who foolishly despised the favour, and defied the wrath of God, very prosperous for a time: but "suddenly Eliphaz cursed," (or predicted the ruin of,) "their habitation:" and accordingly he had witnessed the destruction of their families, and the spoiling of their substance by hungry freebooters, notwithstanding all their care to fence it around, and preserve it.—An allusion was evidently made to Job's former prosperity, to the death of his children by the falling of the house upon them, and the ruin of his fortune by the Sabaeans and Chaldeans. (Notes, i. 13-19. iv. 7-11.) But the most notorious wickedness does not prove, that temporal calamities will befall the perpetrator: and the application certainly was unfair and severe. (Note, xii. 6-10. xxiv. 2-20.)

V. 6, 7. These verses may be rendered, "For affliction cometh not forth of the dust:"—"Although man be born to trouble."—Man is born to labour and sorrow, as certainly, and from as natural a cause, as the sparks of fire mount upward into the air : yet the measure and duration of them result neither from chance, nor necessity, nor second causes ; but from the wise and righteous appointment of God. This is a great truth : but it does not follow that great afflictions are a proof of great wickedness ; for the future world is the state of retributions ; and afflictions in this world in general are merciful corrections, and not the effects of vindictive wrath. (Notes, 17. 2 Pet. ii. 4-9.)

V. 8-10. (Marg. Ref.) Whatever Eliphaz suspected concerning Job's previous character, it is evident he did not mean that his case was hopeless ; and the advice here given was salutary and seasonable ; though the manner of introducing it implies a censure, and savours of self-preference. Instead of complaints and vain wishes, Eliphaz, in Job's case, would seek unto God, and commit his cause to him. This, on any supposition, was Job's duty and wisdom : and the subsequent discourse on the works of God was suited to remind him, that the great Lord of all could easily restore him to peace and prosperity. From the unsearchable and wonderful operations of God in the natural world, which are without number, Eliphaz selected his giving rain unto the earth. This is so common that it is scarcely noticed : and yet the manner in which the water is conveyed, originally from the briny ocean, and distilled in small drops fit for use all over the earth ; and the effects which are thus produced, (the earth rendered fruitful, and springs fed, the rivers supplied, and all nature refreshed and purified,) are worthy of our highest admiration and most ardent gratitude. (Note, Gen. i. 9. xxxvi. 22-33. xxxvii. 1-13. Ps. lxxv. 9-13.) By this, the barren earth, being made to yield a large increase, the poor, and they who are mourning through the dread of starving, are supplied, placed in safety, and even exalted.

V. 11-16. The speaker next noticed especially the surprising method, in which the politic counsels of worldly-wise men are disappointed by divine providence ; and their crafty devices, instead of accomplishing the end proposed, are turned against them. Being carried headlong by some unexpected incident, they involve them in utter ruin ; so that they are taken in a net, and plunged into darkness or despair, just when they think success is sure : nay, they hesitate, and are bewildered, or fall into fatal errors, in the plainest matters, as if they had lost their senses. (Notes, Esth. v. 13, 14. vi. vii. 1 Cor. iii. 18-23. Marg. Ref.) By thus infatuating or ruining proud oppressors, God preserves the poor who are about to be devoured, and gives them hope of better days ; while their oppressors are silenced, confounded, and dismayed, at beholding his work. As, therefore, such interpositions accorded to the ordinary method of Providence, Job might with confidence expect deliverance, if he ceased from his rebellious murmurs, and humbled himself before God.

V. 17. To take vengeance on a criminal, for a warning to others, and to correct an offender for his own good, are very distinct things, which Eliphaz had not before expressly distinguished. Job's extraordinary calamities had led Eliphaz to speak, as if he had been visited in judgment : but here he indulged a hope, that he was corrected of God for his good ; and, if so, he was a happy man, and ought not to despond under his afflictions. He exhorted him, therefore, "not to despise the chastening of the Almighty." (Note, Gen. xvii. 1-3.) He, who appointed his sorrows, was able to destroy and to deliver, as he pleased ; he ought therefore to consider the hand of God in these chastisements, and thankfully receive them as a token of love, and seek to profit by them. (Notes, Ps. xciv. 12-14. Prov. iii. 11-13. Heb. xii. 4-11.)

V. 18, 19. Eliphaz next shewed the benefits, which would result from a proper behaviour under afflictions, and mentioned the happiness of God's people in language similar to that used in other parts of the Old Testament ; (Note, Lev. xxvi. 3, 4.) He observed that every wound was from the hand of God, and he alone could effectually heal it : as the skilful and tender surgeon probes and cuts in order to heal, and then binds up the wound with emollient ointments. When God smites his servants with afflictions, he heals them with consolations, or by returning ease and prosperity ; and when he wounds sinners with deep convictions, he binds up the wound by a sweet sense of forgiveness, after he hath prepared them for so great a mercy. (Notes, 1 Sam. ii. 4-8. Hos. vi. 1-3.) If then Job humbly sought to God under his troubles, he would certainly be delivered : and though he might be tried repeatedly, yet he would still find relief ; so that no evil would eventually come upon him.—Six troubles, and seven, denote many, one succeeding another, (Prov. vi. 16. Ec. xi. 2.)

V. 20-23. In famine, war, or perils from false-witnesses, and malicious slanders, against his life or reputation, or the savages of wild beasts, Job might be assured of support and protection, and might smile in the midst of the most terrifying appearances : for God would so order every dispensation, that it would be, as if the whole animate and inanimate creation were in league with him. (Marg. Ref.) Notes, Ps. xci. 3-13. Hos. ii. 18-20. Rom. viii. 28-39. 1 Cor. iii. 18-23.)

V. 24. "Wheresoever thou pitchest thy tent, thou shalt find it in safety : and when thou takest an account of thy estate, all things shall answer beyond thy expectation." (Bp. Patrick.)—The word rendered "sin," may mean wander, or be disappointed : and perhaps the verse may imply, that when the believer goes from home, he may commit himself and family to the care of God, assured that no tempests, fires, or robbers shall come near his habitation : and that he shall be brought back in peace, without losing his way, or being disappointed at his return, by finding his family ruined, or murdered, or fallen into calamity. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 25-27. In case Job committed his cause to God ; he might also be confident that his posterity would be prosperous, that he would live long, and die in peace, when fully ripe for heaven. (Notes, xlii. 10-17. 1 Chr. xxix. 26-28.) These principles Eliphaz recommended, as the result of his own experience and observation, and those of his friends, and concluded with admonishing Job to regard them for his good, or to make them his own by a practical use of them.—They are indeed good general rules, but they admit of many exceptions : for, though the believer is under the peculiar protection of God in his person, character, family, and all relating to him, and should commit all to his keeping ; the Lord often sees good to withhold the temporal comfort, in order to confer a spiritual blessing of greater value. Indeed, Job's sufferings, so far from being proofs of hypocrisy, were not so much as corrections for any particular offence, but trials of his singular faith, piety, and constancy ; so greatly did his friends mistake his case ! They spoke general truths according to the light of that dispensation ; but they erred in their application of them. The Holy Spirit hath recorded their debate, as infallibly true in point of matter of fact : but we must decide from the general tenor of the Scripture, whether they maintained right principles, and deduced legitimate consequences ; and whether their arguments were or were not conclusive. (Note, xlii. 7-9.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1-7. It is generally dangerous to deviate from the sentiments and practices of the saints of God : and it is very discouraging to be constrained to act contrary to their judgment. But it is common for men to boast, as if believers, in all ages and nations, were of their mind, when they are far from having even a majority in their favour. And at last the word of God is our all-sufficient rule, and not the sentiments of any number of fallible men : so that, in fact, they have sometimes been found right, who seemed not only to have all the world, but almost all the church, against them.—We should watch ourselves, and caution others, against the tormenting and malignant passions of envy and anger ; which rule in the hearts of weak and foolish men with most fatal energy, and not only expose them to the wrath of God, but to the temptations of Satan, and to various species of guilt and misery. But we must not rashly represent every gust of passion or agitation of spirit under trials, reproaches, and temptations, as an evidence of a malevolent disposition : for we should not choose to have our own infirmities treated with such severity.—We may predict the final ruin of wicked men, as exposed to the awful curse of God, even in the zenith of their prosperity, when all around are congratulating and envying them! Their temporal success will soon vanish: and what is got by fraud, oppression, or cruelty, commonly entails a curse on their families and estates. Yet a man's wickedness must be very notorious, to authorize us to interpret his afflictions, or those of his posterity, into divine judgments upon him.—As we are born in sin, and soon run into actual transgression, we are naturally exposed to almost innumerable troubles: but they are all directed by the unerring hand of God, for some wise and righteous purpose; and we should regulate our conduct accordingly.

V. 8-16. It is easy to say, what we would do in trying circumstances; but perhaps we should find it more difficult to observe our own rules, than we now imagine. We ought, however, to give proper advice, and to leave the event to God: and it becomes us under all our trials to seek unto him, and to commit our cause into his hands. Whatever difficulties may be in our case, the Lord knows how to extricate us, by a thousand ways that we never thought of. All his works are wonderful and unsearchable; we see what is wrought, and can discover his wisdom, power, and goodness, in the concatenation of causes and effects in nature; but we cannot comprehend how he works. And too often the great Author of all our comforts, and the manner in which they are conveyed to us, are alike unnoticed, because they are received as things of course. He exalts or depresses, afflicts or comforts, as he pleases, with irresistible power, but in perfect justice, wisdom, and goodness.—They who are perverse and ungodly, and proud of their abilities and sagacity, are generally made to feel, or to expose, their own folly and impotency. "Professing themselves wise, they become fools;" they are often bewildered by their own fancies, and rendered the dupes of their own false reasonings or refined politics; they run into the grossest absurdities, commit the most egregious mistakes, are bewildered in uncertainty in the plainest matters, and grope at noon-day as if it were midnight; for "God takes them in their own craftiness, and makes foolish the wisdom of this world." Idolaters and atheistical philosophers of old; sceptics, infidels, and materialists of modern days; are awful proofs of these truths: and so are politic persecutors and oppressors of the church, in every age.—In vain have learning, wisdom, authority, cruelty, and every device of men and devils, united, to subvert the church of God, and extirpate his poor despised people. Their schemes have been frustrated, "their hands have not been able to perform their enterprise;" their "counsels have been carried headlong," and they have been taken in their own snare; infatuated and driven to destruction; and all their successors may expect the same fate. For the poor and despised people of God, though deemed weak, foolish, and defenceless, can neither be overcome nor assaulted with impunity. The church still subsists; "the poor in spirit have hope," and expect to triumph at the destruction of their enemies, when the boastings and blasphemies of the wicked will be for ever silenced, or turned into shame and anguish.

V. 17-27. "Happy is the man whom God correcteth!" We should therefore consider our afflictions, as so many kind warnings to examine ourselves, confess our sins, seek mercy from God, and walk more diligently in his ways: we should humble ourselves before him, and neither despise his rod, nor seek help or relief from any one else. He alone can effectually remove temporal afflictions, and give peace to the wounded conscience, or relief to the troubled spirit. And when we have found pardon of sin, peace with God, and deliverance from the power of sin, we may without reserve venture our all in his hands. He will provide for our real wants, and protect us in the way of duty, so that no evil can hurt us: and deliver us from all the troubles with which we may please to prove us. Our reputations may be torn by the scourge of the slanderer's tongue; but he will hide us from the effects of such accusers, and clear up our characters in due time. Our habitations, families, and the time and circumstances of our death, may be safely trusted to him; all creatures shall be instruments of good to us, though perhaps contrary to their nature or intention; all events will benefit us; and we may smile when others tremble. We may go out and come in, lie down and rise up, without distrustful fear, assured of the special care of heaven, till the Lord see good to call us home. We are not authorized to expect great wealth; long life, flourishing families, or exemption from tribulations: but we are assured that all will be ordered in the best manner possible, and that we shall not be summoned by death till we are ripe for glory, and have lived as long as it is good for us in this world. has been the confidence, observation, and experience of godly men, in all ages; may we hear it, and know it for our good!

NOTES.

CHAP. VI. V. 1-4. Job, conscious of integrity, and displeased, rather than convinced, by Eliphaz's reasonings, replied, by wishing that his miseries might be impartially balanced against his complaints, assured that he should not have been so harshly censured, if his sorrows had not been made too light of; for, in fact, they were so numerous and weighty, that he could find nothing adequate with which to compare them; and all his words fell very short of fully describing them. In addition to his external troubles, the inward sense of the wrath of God, and the dread of his almighty vengeance, like poisoned arrows, infected his soul, and exhausted his courage and resolution; or, like a powerful army placed in array against him, they cut off his hope of escape, and almost drove him to distraction. (Marg. Ref.)—Doubtless, this was the effect of Satan's temptations, who endeavoured, by every horrible impression on his imagination, to drive him to curse God, or blaspheme, as he had declared that we would, if fully tried. (Notes, i. 9-11. ii. 5, 6, 12, 13.) while the Lord was pleased to favour the trial, by withholding from him all sensible comfort, and leaving him in darkness and dismay.—In this he was a type of Christ, when agonizing in the garden; and when upon the cross he exclaimed "My God! my God! why hast thou forsaken me?" (Notes, Matt. xxvi. 36-39. xxvii. 46.)

V. 5-7. In these verses Job intimated that his friends, being free from trouble and temptation, did nothing more in being contented than the wild ass, or the ox, does, when at ease, and plentifully fed. But he must be allowed to express his anguish by groans and complaints, which were no more to be censured than the braying of the wild ass, or the lowing of the ox, when destitute of provender. And, indeed, the discourse of Eliphaz was so destitute of the savour of wisdom and kindness, and so unsuitable for the occasion, that it was impossible he should relish it; yet this, as "sorrowful meat," was all he had to feed his soul upon under his affliction and depression, though at any time he should have entirely disregarded it.—Some think he meant, that it was as natural to expect encouraging words under heavy trials, as it is to ask for salt to eat with the white of an egg; whereas the discourse of Eliphaz tended to render his trials more burdensome than they were before. It is plain, however, that he rejected and undervalued the good advice which had been given, because of the injurious reflections on his character, with which it was introduced. (Notes, v. 2-7.)

V. 8-13. The passionate earnestness with which Job here requested to die, and the vehement language which he used, were very unbecoming. It seemed as if God could bestow on him no greater favour than instantaneous death, in whatever manner it should come. (Notes, Num. xi. 11-15. 1 Kings xix. 3, 4. Jon. iv. 1-8.) This was his chief desire and request, and almost his only one; but it was very rash in him to speak of God's "destroying," or crushing, or "letting loose his hand" and "cutting him off," and "not sparing him;" and of his "hardening himself in sorrow," and being "comforted" in the prospect of immediate dissolution. Alas! he knew not what he said; for who, during a single hour, could endure the wrath of the Almighty, if he spared not, but let loose his hand against him?—Relief from lingering misery was Job's great object; yet he evidently thought of a future world, when he declared that "he had not concealed the words of the Holy One." He meant, that he was no hypocrite; but as he had professed the words of the holy God, so he had believed and obeyed them, as the avowed and real rule of his conduct. He seems, however, to have spoken too much in a way of self-justification and despondency, and not simply as stating the ground of his desire to leave this world and go to a better.—He added, that he had no strength left, which could inspire a hope of a termination to his afflictions, except in death; and if he had the strength of stones or brass, his sufferings would soon wear it out. Yet his understanding, and the testimony of a good conscience, were continued to him; he knew what he was discoursing of, and his wisdom was not quite driven from him; yet his friends despised his words.—Though Job thus longed and prayed for death, he did not think that he was authorized to commit suicide. A heathen philosopher, or a modern unbeliever, would not have been so scrupulous. (Notes, ii. 9, 10. iii. 20-23.)

V. 14. He who does not compassionate his afflicted friend, but reproaches him, casts off his regard to the authority of God, as well as love to his brother. (Marg. Ref.)—Some, however, understand the verse, as Job's representation of the behaviour of his friends to him; in which sense it may be rendered, "They

V. 15—23. The friends of Job had appeared very affectionate to him, when prosperous; and in his calamity he had hoped for support and consolation from their visit, but he had been miserably disappointed. This he represented by an appropriate simile. In those countries, the ice and snow, melting upon the mountains, at certain seasons, filled the brooks with water, so that they appeared like rivers, swelled and discoloured with the inundation; and the Arabian companies, or caravans, travelling through the deserts, marked the course of these brooks, which were full of water when it was not wanted. But when, in the heat of summer, they were parched with thirst, and resorted thither in hopes of a supply, they found that these brooks were entirely dried up, and this filled them with distress and confusion. (Note, Jer. xv. 15—18.) Thus Job's expectations from his friends came to nothing, and he was ashamed of his former confidence. (Notes, Is. xxviii. 16. xlv. 15—17. Jer. xiv. 2—6. Joel i. 11.) For when his friends looked on his miseries, they seemed afraid lest he should become a burden, or a disgrace to them; and therefore they treated him with unkindness. But had he ever requested them to make up his losses by presents, to rescue or ransom his substance from the Sabaeans and Chaldeans, or even to protect him from further violence? Indeed, he chiefly wanted consolation to his soul.

V. 24, 25. Job was unwilling that his friends should suppose he refused to receive instruction, or reproof. If, therefore they would mildly teach him any useful lesson, or point out his mistakes, he would silently hearken. For "right words," or salutary truths, proposed with conclusive proofs and fair application, were powerfully convincing: but the unfounded suspicions, and uncandid censures, of Eliphaz, could not be received as just reproof.

V. 26. Eliphaz had nothing explicit for which he could reprove Job, except some passionate words, which excess of anguish had extorted from him, when almost driven to desperation. (Notes, ii. 12, 13. iii.) These ought, therefore, to have been no more regarded than a sudden gust of wind, which is soon followed by a calm; or, as some understand the passage, the rest of his discourse should not on that account have been treated with contempt, as empty sound.—Had Eliphaz calmly shewed Job that his passionate language was unbecoming his character for piety, in the manner that the latter had reproved his wife, he might have submitted to the rebuke; (Note, ii. 10;) but his intimations that Job had been a hypocrite, entirely defeated this end, and made Job think himself excusable.

V. 27—30. In Job's opinion, his friends acted as cruelly as if they had oppressed a fatherless child, who had none to defend him; and as ungratefully and unfaithfully, as if they had digged a pit for their friend to fall into and perish. He therefore intreated them to be content with his sufferings, which they might perceive to be very great, and not to aggravate them by reproaches; and to favour him by reconsidering his cause, examining it more accurately, and deciding upon it more candidly. If he had spoken any falsehood, they might easily confute him; if he were a wicked man, they might detect him. If they could not do either of these, let them retract their sentence, and not impute his sufferings to his iniquity; for he was conscious that he was upright in the sight of God, which would be made evident by fuller investigation. He thought he could savour what was true and good, and distinguish what was perverse and profane; and though he allowed he had spoken rash words, he was not conscious that there had been iniquity in his tongue.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—14. In deciding on the conduct of those who seem impatient, we should carefully consider the number and aggravations of their distresses, which often appear to the sufferer even greater than his heaviest complaints, and beyond the power of words to express. A heart, wounded with the fear, or sense, of the wrath of God, assaulted with grievous temptations, filled with horror, and verging to despair, is far more dreadful and intolerable, than any external afflictions; yet, these "pains of hell" have often taken hold of the most beloved servants of God. (Notes, 2 Sam. xxii. 5, 6. Ps. cxvi. 3.) Mere spectators cannot estimate trials of this kind; and few pious men have sufficient wisdom, experience, and tenderness, to deal properly with those who are thus deserted, oppressed, and overwhelmed.—What then did the Saviour endure in the garden, and on the cross, when "he bare our sins," and his soul was made a sacrifice to divine justice for us! and what will sinners, who neglect so great salvation, for ever endure in the regions of darkness and despair! "There, indeed, the arrows of the Almighty are within them, the poison whereof drinketh up their spirit. The terrors of God set themselves in array against them," and they can neither escape nor endure them.—They who know no want, and feel no pain, may easily be composed, and critically comment on the words and actions of such as are in overwhelming trouble; but their discourses are generally insipid, and often distressing. Indeed, these in general appear worse than they really are; for, in anguish, a man loses his relish for truths which before were palatable; he is disposed to be fretful and fastidious; and a little which galls him, sets him against all that might comfort him. This should be well considered by those who discourse with persons in great distress; and, except they can command evident affection, sympathy, and caution, it is better to let the storm subside before they speak at all, lest they cause it to rage with still greater impetuosity.—Furious passions are peculiarly culpable when they dictate prayers; for men seldom wish or pray for death, except when they are in a rebellious frame of spirit. We should, indeed, be habitually ready and willing to depart, and indifferent about earthly objects, which may so soon render life itself a burden; but surely we may find something more excellent to request of God, than to be delivered from present suffering; and it ill suits our state and character to speak of hardening our hearts under the strokes of the Almighty, if he should "not spare," but "let loose his hand to cut us off." Rather, we should humble ourselves under his mighty hand; bow down in submission to his will; hope in his mercy; and intreat him to lighten the weight of his chastisements, and to consider how frail we are. In his favour we may yet have comfort, let our outward condition be ever so bad; whether he please to take us to heaven, to be with us in the furnace of affliction on earth, or to restore us to peace and prosperity; for "the things that are impossible with man, are possible with God."—We may easily see that we ought to act thus under every possible trial; but if we were tempted as Job was, we know not how we should behave.—The testimony of conscience to our integrity in our past conduct, as professed Christians, may properly be our rejoicing; yet it may be so pleaded as to savour of pride, rebellion, and despondency. It is also a mercy under severe diseases to retain the exercise of our reasoning faculties; yet, sometimes men use them with perverse ingenuity, to argue against their own comfort, and to vindicate their unbelief and impatience. Persons, however, of this description, are entitled to our peculiar compassion; their wounds require healing balm, not sharp corrosives; and if we do not behave with tenderness to the afflicted, we despise the authority of God, and fail of our duty to him.

V. 15—30. It is our duty and wisdom to "cease from men;" (Notes, Ps. cxlvi. 3. P. O. Is. ii. 22. P. O. 10—22. Close.) the nearest friends and relatives, yea, they who are wise and pious, through mistake and prejudice often disappoint our expectations. They may be exceedingly kind and attentive, while we are at ease and in affluence; yet, in adversity, we shall find most of them, like the brook, which by the land-flood became a torrent, but in the drought of summer, proves a dry channel, and disappoints the hopes of the fainting traveller. But they who trust in God shall never be ashamed of their confidence; for he will be peculiarly helpful to them, when all other helpers and comforts fail; yea, though "flesh and heart fail, he will be the strength of their hearts, and their portion for ever."—When men see their friends cast down, they too commonly fear being involved with them, and exposed to danger, expense, and trouble; and so they appear shy of them, and perhaps unjustly criminate their conduct, to excuse their own. Yet, sometimes the afflicted suspect their friends without cause.—It is our duty to help others to the utmost of our ability; but it is generally our wisdom to bear our own losses and difficulties as well as we can, and to avoid becoming a burden to our friends. Prudence therefore requires us, when prosperous, to avoid needless indulgences, and to inure ourselves to some degree of hardship; that if a change should take place, (and none can know "what a day may bring forth,") we may not have to say, "the things, that my soul refused to touch, are become as my sorrowful meat."—A wise man will, at all times, be glad to be counselled, and convinced of his errors, by right words, that forcibly rectify his judgment and impress his heart. But most of us are apt to be too impatient, when we hear men argue inconclusively, especially when their discourse bears hard on our sentiments and conduct. Indeed, rash expressions, dictated by anguish of spirit, should not be severely criticized; but, though they do not prove us hypocrites, they evince that we are far from humbly acquiescing in the Divine will. It is,

Job excuses his desire of death, by representing the vanity, misery, and uselessness of his life, 1-6. He expostulates with God in a mixture of complaints and petitions; and concludes with confessing that he had sinned, and asking forgiveness before his death, 7-21.

20 I have sinned; what shall I do unto thee, O thou Preserver of men? why hast thou set me as a mark against thee, so that I am a burden to myself?

21 And why dost thou not pardon my transgression, and take away mine iniquity? for now shall I sleep in the dust; and thou shalt seek me in the morning, but I shall not be.

however, still more unbecoming to retaliate on reprovers, and to charge them with malice, when perhaps they spoke from genuine love. Yet, if we have rashly condemned any one, we ought to review the evidence with impartiality and candour, and to retract our censure if found unmerited. We do not love to be treated as hypocrites, contrary to evidence, or the testimony of our consciences; and we should not thus condemn others. But it is best to commit our character to Him who keeps our souls; and to appeal to that day, when he will "bring to light the hidden things of darkness, and make manifest the counsels of all hearts," and then shall every upright believer "have praise of God."

NOTES.

CHAP. VII. V. 1-6. Job here represented the life of man on earth, to be like the appointed time of warfare to the soldier, (for so the expression may be interpreted;) or, the labourer's day for his work. The one earnestly wished for his discharge, that he might be exempted from further labours and perils; the other looked with desire for the shadows of the evening, when he should receive his wages, and go to rest; and why might not Job wish for death, to terminate his sorrows, and bring him to that happier state for which he yet hoped? (Note, 2 Tim. iv. 6-8.) This was the more allowable, as his life was now both joyless and useless, and full of tedious sufferings, without any remission, even by night; for that season, of rest to others, was spent by him in agony, and in longing for the dawning of the day, (Deut. xxxviii. 67;) nay, his disease was so noisome, that it made him like a putrefied corpse, even before his death. (Notes, ii. 7, 8. xxx. 17-19.) All this had come upon him so suddenly, that his happier days were gone instantaneously; and his remnant of life, which in itself was exceedingly short and transient, was vanishing, without hope of returning health and comfort.—Spent, &c. (6.) 'Finished for want of thread' (E. Smith.) The original will admit this translation; and several critics have adopted it as keeping up the simile.

V. 7-11. In the middle of this discourse with his friends, Job seems to have lifted up his thoughts to God, and mingled some actings of faith and hope with his fretfulness and despondency. He desired the Lord to remember how fleeting his life was at best; and either to abate his anguish, or release him from it, as he had no hope of seeing any more comfort here. A single look from God would end his days; and, as the clouds vanish, and others are formed in their places, so men die, and never return to occupy their former stations, but others succeed them from age to age.—This does not by any means imply a denial of a future state or the resurrection of the dead; but it merely describes the condition of mankind respecting this present life. (Note, Ec. i. 4-11.)—As therefore Job could get no relief from his sufferings, he resolved to relieve his mind by venting his complaints.—If he had poured out his soul before God, that indeed would have abated the anguish of his spirit; but his expostulations only increased his vexation, and seemed to reflect on the Divine justice and goodness. (Notes, 1 Sam. i. 9-16. Ps. xxxix. 1-4. lxxvii. 1-3. cxlii. 1-3. Matt. xxvi. 36-46.)

V. 12. Again addressing God as the author of his sufferings, Job inquired whether he were like a tempestuous ocean, or some vast whale, or unruly monster, that it was needful he should be restrained from doing mischief by such heavy afflictions; which confined him like chains, a prison, and a guard, so that he could not move?

V. 13, 14. It may be supposed that Satan was the author of these terrifying dreams and visions. Job, indeed, supposed that they were sent from God to enhance his distress; but God only permitted them, for the trial of his faith. (Notes, Gen. xl. 6. xli. 1-8. Dan. ii. 1. iv. 4-7. Matt. xxvii. 19.)

V. 15, 16. Job was so weary of life, that he would have preferred any violent death to its continuance, while wasted to bones, or a skeleton, and filled with pain. Nay, he so loathed life, that he besought God to withdraw his supporting hand, and then he should expire of course. This at least seems to have been his meaning.—He would not, however, destroy his own life. (Note, vi. 8-13.)

V. 17-19. Why should the almighty God magnify such a poor worm as man, in thus contending with him, and setting his heart upon subduing him; watching his opportunities of afflicting him; or making continual trial how much he could support, without allowing him a moment's respite? (Notes, xxxix. 10-15. Ps. viii. 4-9. cxliv. 3, 4.)—It is difficult to expound the language of one, who spoke the dictates of passion, rather than of reason, and whose soul was engaged in a continued conflict between temptation and divine grace; which alternately prevailed, and reciprocally defeated the effects of each other. (Note, Gal. v. 16-18.)

V. 20, 21. Job would not allow that he was a wicked man, or hypocrite; yet, he confessed before God, that he was a sinner: he acknowledged that he could do nothing to recover his favour: and he inquired for what cause the Lord marked him out from among his fellow-sinners, as the object of his particular displeasure, by such unprecedented calamities as rendered him "a burden to himself." (Note, xvi. 6-16. Lam. iii. 10-13.)—He called God "the Preserver of men." He is the preserver of our lives, and the saviour of the souls of all that believe: but probably Job meant "the Observer of men," for his eyes are upon the ways and upon the hearts of all men, to render to every one of them according to their deeds.—Job was also assured, that God was merciful, and that he could, consistently with his glory, pardon his transgressions, and take away his iniquity: and he was very desirous of some token, that this inestimable favour was granted him. Indeed, he could not understand why God did not forgive him; and he apprehended that this mercy, if not granted soon, would come too late; for that he should, during the night, be laid in the dust, and when the Lord in the morning sought for him to shew him favour, he should not be found.—These concluding verses contain a very singular intermixture of faith and unbelief; and this renders it the more difficult to explain them.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The appointed term of our lives is known to God, but to us it is uncertain; while it continues, we have a warfare to accomplish, and a work to do; and our eternal state will be decided accordingly as we acquit ourselves. The believer, by the grace of God "fights the good fight of faith," performs his appointed service; then rests from his labours, and receives the conqueror's crown, as a gracious recompense from the hand of his merciful Saviour.—When conflicting with sore temptations, and burdened with weighty afflictions, we may properly long after the promised rest, and welcome the shadows of the evening, the assaults of sickness, the inroads of old age, and the prospects of dissolution; yet, like valiant soldiers, or patient labourers, we should be willing to endure fatigue and hardship a little longer, and not impatiently desire release from suffering.—"Wearisome months and years, indeed, may be appointed for us;" and some eminent servants of God have had such complicated sufferings, by day and by night, as to deprive them of all ease and respite. Nay, Satan has been permitted so to harass them with temptations, when asleep as well as when awake, that the horror and anguish of their dreams have given Bildad blames Job for reflecting on the justice of God, 1—3. He intimates that his children had been cast off for their sins, yet encourages Job to seek unto God, 4—7. He appeals to the ancients, to prove the certain doom of hypocrites, 8—19. He applies the argument to the case of Job, 20—22.

THEN answered Bildad the Shuhite, and said,
2 How long wilt thou speak these things? and how long shall the words of thy mouth be like a strong wind?

3 Doth God pervert judgment? or doth the Almighty pervert justice?

4 If thy children have sinned against him, and he have cast them away for their transgression;

5 If thou wouldest seek unto God betimes, and make thy supplication to the Almighty;

6 If thou wert pure and upright; surely now he would awake for thee, and make the habitation of thy righteousness prosperous.

7 Though thy beginning was small, yet thy latter end should greatly increase.

them an idea of hell itself.—In such circumstances, it cannot be expected, that the tempest-tossed sufferer should avoid all improper expressions; and as, if this were our own case, we should need tenderness and forbearance from our brethren; we should learn to make allowances for them, and behave towards them, when in distress, with candour and compassion. We should also pray earnestly not to be “led into temptation;” and we may well loathe such an evil world as this, and be unwilling to remain in it for ever: yet, life with all its sorrows is valuable, if improved to glorify our God, to serve our generation, and to secure our own salvation. Though the Lord will prove his people, and Satan may tempt them, and they may passionately “choose strangling rather than life;” yet grace will restrain the actings of indwelling sin, and preserve them from presumptuous and desperate wickedness; and divine consolations will in general counterbalance outward sufferings.—But how wretched is sinful man, without the knowledge of a Saviour! Accumulated miseries may render life intolerable, and fears of future vengeance make the thought of death unspeakably tremendous; or, being hardened in infidelity or despair, a poor sinner may be tempted, as “choosing strangling, and death rather than life,” to plunge himself from temporal into eternal misery.—How loathsome may disease render our sinful bodies, even while we live! and death will surely return them, by putrefaction, to the dust whence they were taken. To that state we are all hastening; our days pass away swifter than a weaver’s shuttle; our lives are vanishing like the unstable cloud, and our earthly possessions will soon be in other hands. Let us then despair of seeing good on earth, except in the hope of heaven; let us without delay “seek those things which are above,” and, instead of rebelliously murmuring at the appointments of God, and speaking in the bitterness of our souls; let us pour out our hearts in humble confessions of our sins, and in fervent prayers for forgiveness, and that we may be spared till fitted for a better world.—Whatever may be thought in the hour of temptation, the Lord is kind to his people; and he is doing them important good, when perhaps they are ready to conclude, that he is waiting an occasion to destroy them. His condescension and compassion to such worthless worms are infinite; he could crush us in a moment, and we all deserve it; but he visits and chastens us for our good, to exercise and prove our graces, to subdue our iniquities, and to restrain us from sin; and his mercies are far more numerous than the stripes of his correcting rod. The Lord is our constant Observer, but he is also the gracious Saviour of all who trust in him. As we can conceal nothing from him; let us plead guilty before his throne of grace, that we may not be condemned at his judgment-seat. And we should do this earnestly; because in the grave it will be too late to repent, and seek his face. But if we wait upon him in the appointed way, the tokens of his love will in due time be vouchsafed; and we may then look forward to the hour of death, with patient submission, and joyful hope.

NOTES.

CHAP. VIII. V. 1—3. As the messengers had come one after another, to inform Job of his calamities; (Notes, i. 13—19:); so his friends followed each other in their censures of him; and thus they inadvertently aided Satan in tempting him to blasphemy and despair. (Notes, i. 9—11. iv. 1.) It seems that they were agreed in their judgment, concerning the case and character of Job; so that it next devolved on Bildad to answer him, and confirm the doctrine of Eliphaz.—Job had spoken important truths, though intermingled with many sallies of passion; but Bildad abruptly and harshly condemned the whole, as boisterous, unreasonable, and pernicious, like a tempestuous wind; and charged him with stating, that God perverted justice and judgement, which Job certainly did not mean to do. (Notes, xxxiv. 10—15. Gen. xviii. 23—26.)

V. 4—7. Perhaps Bildad intended to distinguish between the case of Job, 11 Can the rush grow up without mire? can the flag grow without water?

12 Whilst it is yet in his greenness, and not cut down, it withereth before any other herb.

13 So are the paths of all that forget God; and the hypocrite’s hope shall perish:

14 Whose hope shall be cut off, and whose trust shall be a spider’s web.

15 He shall lean upon his house, but it shall not stand: he shall hold it fast, but it shall not endure.

16 He is green before the sun, and his branch shooteth forth in his garden.

17 His roots are wrapped about the heap, and seeth the place of stones.

18 If he destroy him from his place, then it shall deny him, saying, I have not seen thee.

19 Behold, this is the joy of his way, and out of the earth shall others grow.

20 Behold, God will not cast away a perfect man, neither will he help the evil-doers:

21 Till he fill thy mouth with laughing, and thy lips with rejoicing.

and that of his children, in order to shew that there was yet hope for him, though not for them: but many think he designed to warn him, by the example of sudden vengeance thus set before him. It was, however, very unfeeling thus to introduce so distressing a subject; and still more so to intimate that his children had been cut off for their sins, and had perished in them. (Notes, i. 5. 13. 18, 19. iv. 7—11. v. 3—5.)—The language also, in which Bildad conveys his good counsel, seems to imply, that Job’s integrity and piety must at least remain dubious, unless manifested by his returning prosperity; whereas, had he died of his disease, or worn out many years in penury and pain, it would have been no just impeachment of his character; especially if he had recovered the composure of his mind, in submission to the will of God. It was right, however, to exhort Job without delay to seek and pray unto God; and to encourage him to hope for the recovery of his health and comforts, from the goodness of the Almighty; who was able to raise him from very small beginnings, to a great increase of wealth, honour, and happiness. (Notes, v. 8—16. xxii. 21—30.)

V. 8—10. Job had slighted Eliphaz’s discourse as insipid, and his arguments as inconclusive. (Note, vi. 5—7.) Bildad therefore allowed that, by reason of the comparative shortness of their lives, they did not know so much as their fathers did, who had had longer time for making observations, and could speak more decidedly from their own heart, or experience. To their testimony therefore he appealed, and desired Job to bestow pains to examine the traditions or records, which they had of their sentiments. (Note, v. 1.)—Some think that Bildad, being descended from Abraham by Keturah, had especial reference to the eminent piety and prosperity of that patriarch.—It has been observed, that Job and his friends seem to have possessed all that superiority of knowledge on every useful subject, especially on things relating to true religion, which has been groundlessly ascribed to the Egyptians, &c.; and that they traced this knowledge back to the tradition of the fathers, or patriarchs; that is, to traditional revelation.

V. 11—19. It seems to have been Bildad’s design, in this passage, to represent, by various similitudes, the apparent piety, and the fading prosperity, of the hypocrite; and to insinuate that this was applicable to the case of Job.—A rush, or flag, growing by the river’s side, or in a fenny soil, flourishes while well watered: but when the mire and water fall through drought, it needs not be cut down, but withers of itself, more speedily than other herbs. Thus the hypocrite’s professed religion, and confidence in God, are maintained while worldly interests nourish them; but they come to nothing when these supports fail. Having no root of faith and grace, his piety dies away in persecution or tribulation: and, in like manner, God may often expose his hypocrisy by taking away his prosperity. (Notes, Matt. xiii. 20, 21. Jude 11—13.) This indeed, is the proper emblem of all those who forget God; but especially of the hypocrite.—His vain confidence may also be compared to the spider’s web, spun by the insect from its own resources, with great ingenuity, and suited to answer its present purposes: but easily swept away at once, as though it had never been. (Note, Is. lix. 5—8.) Thus, suitable temptations destroy the hypocrite’s religion; sudden judgments tear from him all his transient prosperity; and all his endeavours to maintain either his character for piety, or his worldly consequence, by means of powerful friends and relations, prove unsuccessful. Indeed, he may be compared to a tree growing in the garden, and striking root even into the rock; yet after a time cut down and thrown aside; while another is planted in its place. So, wicked men, when they seem most firmly established, are suddenly thrown down, treated with neglect, and sink into oblivion and contempt; while others, from the lowest stations and of the same disposition, come in their place, whose joy in their wicked ways is equally

CHAP. IX.

Job acknowledges and celebrates God's justice, wisdom, power, and wonderful works, 1—13. He disclaims all attempts to justify himself, 14—21. But insists, that a man's innocence should not be judged of by what befalls him in this world, 22—24. He alleges his sufferings, but will not presume to dispute with the Author of them, 25—35.

transient and unstable.—In general, the hypocrite's religion, and the ungodly man's prosperity, having no firm support, are precarious and of short duration: yet, as to this present world, every general rule admits of many exceptions; and the illustrations adduced were wholly inapplicable to the case of Job.

V. 20—22. If Job were indeed a sound character, without guile, or hypocrisy, in his professed piety; (Notes, i. 1. John i. 47—51;) Bildad was assured that his prosperity and comfort would return, and his enemies would be put to shame; (Marg. Ref.) but if a wicked man, he would never be raised above his calamities, but would sink under them.—Bildad seems to have formed in his mind a fixed rule of providence concerning this. Yet there was a fallacy in his reasoning and that of his friends, arising from their not distinguishing between the present state of trial and discipline, and the future state of retributions. Hence they concluded, that Job denied the justice of God and the advantages of piety; because he maintained, that in this world, wicked men often prospered, and godly men were afflicted.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

Even in religious controversies, it is common for men to treat each other with acrimony, and their opponents with contempt; to overlook what is evidently good; to make the worst of what is apparently faulty; and to charge horrible consequences upon very inoffensive tenets.—There is a way, which some have, of bringing odium on the sentiments of those who oppose them, by attempting to shew that they impute injustice, cruelty, or tyranny to the Almighty; which is calculated to shock every pious mind. Truth needs not, and error ought not, to be thus defended. We are not competent to judge in many cases, what it becomes the universal and everlasting Sovereign to do. We should believe assuredly that he is just, wise, and good, in those dispensations which exceed our comprehension; and wait for the day of the revelation of his righteous judgment to the assembled world. Nay, even when doctrines may evidently be proved inconsistent with the Divine perfections, as well as with Scripture, it becomes us to treat such subjects with great reverence, modesty, and caution. We are sure God will “not pervert judgment:” he can have no inducement to it, and it is impossible in itself. But we must not judge of characters by providential dispensations, or concur with those who condemn the afflicted. When we mention the remarkable deaths of others, we should not consider them as divine judgments, or decide on the state of their souls; except upon the most undeniable evidence of their presumptuous impenitent wickedness: and it is cruel needlessly to mention a case of this kind, however striking, in the presence of a sorrowing parent or relation. On every occasion, however, waving all topics foreign to the subject, we should exhort the afflicted to “seek the Lord,” without delay, by earnest prayer; and we should encourage them with the prospect of returning comfort from his power and mercy. He will awake for those who sincerely repent and believe: and, though their “beginning be small, their latter end will greatly increase.”—We should, indeed, prepare diligently, to enquire into the sentiments of wise men in other ages on these important subjects: especially that we may become acquainted with the experience and observations of those “elders, who through faith obtained a good report,” and which are recorded for our instruction and warning. And, notwithstanding the shortness of our lives, we may thus obtain true wisdom for our present and eternal good. But all human authority, whether of ancient fathers or modern reasoners, must be submitted to the decision of the sacred oracles.—Forgetfulness of God, and false apprehensions of him, his truth, and his will, render men either hypocrites or openly ungodly. These evils spring from a corrupt and carnal mind; and wicked men, of every description, will find that their joys and hopes must soon wither like the worthless rush, be swept away as the spider's web, and they themselves cut down like the barren fig-tree. these earthly joys and false confidences one generation succeeds after another: while millions perish without any regarding it! Thus men deceive themselves and others, and are deceived by Satan; yet every object in nature, when duly attended to, warns them not to lean on such failing supports, to adopt such self-devised expedients, or to rejoice in such perishing comforts.—But, though the upright soul may be severely tried, God will never cast him away; and at length he shall be filled with satisfying and unfailing joy, to the confusion of his enemies, who shall perish for ever. May we choose the portion, possess the confidence, bear the cross, and “die the death, of the righteous:” and in the mean time be careful neither to wound others by rash judgments, nor to distress ourselves about the opinion of our fellow-creatures.

NOTES.

CHAP. IX. V. 1—3. In this answer, Job paid no regard to Bildad's severe reflections, but confined himself more to the point in hand than before. He declared, (referring to Bildad's assertion, that God did not pervert justice, viii. 3;) that he had no doubt concerning the righteousness of God in all his dispensations; nor did he mean so, when he denied himself to be a hypocrite: “for how should man be just before God?” Before him he pleaded guilty of numerous transgressions; and should God contend with him in judgment, he could not justify one out of a thousand, of all the thoughts, words, and actions of his life: so that he deserved worse than all his present sufferings. But he evidently meant, that this was common to him with the best of men, and did not prove him a hypocrite, or an atrocious criminal; though his afflictions were great beyond example.

V. 4—13. Instead of cursing God to his face, (as Satan falsely asserted he would,) Job set himself to celebrate his perfections and wonderful works. He was as fully assured of the wisdom and power of God, as of his justice: he knew that none could finally prosper or be happy, who hardened themselves in rebellion against him. Indeed, opposition against him must be as foolish as impious: the Almighty, without any previous notice, is able to overturn the deep-rooted mountains, to shake the nations with earthquakes, and to remove, or destroy, the earth in a moment; he can forbid the sun or stars to shine, or at once extinguish their fires; he spreadeth out the heavens as his canopy, and walketh upon the stormy waves of the sea as subjected to his authority. (Note, Matt. xiv. 25—27;) and he arrangeth the constellations of the heavens, and the seasons of the year, as he pleaseth. In short, his works are incomprehensibly great, and innumerable. In all these things he acts invisibly, and on every side: he is present, though unperceived, and can crush his opponents ere they are aware. He can also take away children, wealth, health, or life, and none can hinder him, or call him to account: and if his anger be not pacified, the stoutest and proudest helpers must sink under his powerful vengeance. It would be madness therefore for feeble man to resist his will.—No allusion appears to be made in this passage, to the miraculous displays of the Divine power recorded in Scripture, except it be to the convulsions of the deluge.—“The names of the constellations, “Arcturus, Orion, and Pleiades,” are taken from the Greek version, and are supposed to correspond with the original words, Hash, or Ash, Chesil, and Kima. “The chambers of the south,” may mean those stars, which are seen in the southern hemisphere, but not in the northern, or those which only appear in the south at certain seasons of the year. (Notes, xxxviii. 31—41. Am. v. 7—9.)

V. 14—21. If therefore no man could justify himself before God, or withstand his power, Job, in his present abject condition, thought himself peculiarly unfit for so bold an attempt; for his mind was confused, and he could not select apt words to express his meaning, in what he desired to speak concerning him. Even if he had been completely righteous, he would rather supplicate the favour of his Judge, than claim deliverance from his justice. Indeed, he was so entirely disheartened, that an immediate answer to his prayer could not embolden him to hope, that God would return to him in mercy. For, though conscious that he had not given cause for it by any gross wickedness or hypocrisy, yet God had so overwhelmed him with the tempest of his wrath; had so wounded him in body and soul, with reiterated strokes, without giving him the least breathing-time; and had so filled him with bitterness; that he could not but regard him with terror. (Notes, xvi. 6-16. Ps. lxxvii. 2, 3.) At the same time, he knew that it was impossible to resist his almighty power, or to escape his omnipresence: and it would be equally absurd to think of deciding the controversy by a judicial trial; for who had authority to act as judge, and to appoint the time and place of hearing? Nay, were that possible, it would be in vain; for if no other guilt should be charged on him, his attempt to justify himself before God, and every argument which he should use in such a cause, would condemn him as a perverse and rebellious creature. Even if not conscious of any guilt, he would not think himself free from criminality; for he did not know his own soul, as his heart-searching Judge did: and therefore he would despise his own life, and submit to any sentence, rather than contend with the Majesty of heaven. (Note, 1 Cor. iv. 3-5.)—There is in this passage a great deal of truth, as well as sound reasoning and honourable thoughts of God: yet there is also a considerable tincture of unbelief and despondency. Some hope in the Divine mercy seems implied; but that attribute is not mentioned, and Job was only supported from sinking into despair.—They, who know something of Satan's dark temptations, when the soul is filled with horrible thoughts of God, which tend to subvert the foundations of hope, will, from their own distressing experience, better understand Job's meaning, than from any unexperienced commentator. Had they at such times been urged to speak, their discourse would have contained a similar conflict between hard and honourable thoughts of God; between gloomy despondency and feeble hope; rebellious murmurs, and a desire to submit, conscious that it was their duty so to do. (Notes, Jer. xx. 10-18.—Without cause, (17.) (Notes, 1-3. Ps. xxv. 2, 3.)

V. 22-24. Here Job lays down the precise subject, upon which he was at issue with his friends, and on which the Lord at length decided in his favour (Note, xlii. 7-9.) He maintained against them, that the dispensations of Providence, in this world, make no exact discrimination between the righteous and the wicked; that when God scourges guilty nations, by war, famine, or pestilence, they, who are comparatively innocent and truly pious, are often involved in the common calamity; and that, in such sudden desolations, the Lord does not wait, so to speak, to try their causes: or the scourge is figuratively spoken of as laughing at distinctions in the characters of the sufferers. (Notes, vii. 20-22. Ec. ix. 1-3. Ez. xxi. 2-5.) Indeed the earth is chiefly possessed and governed by wicked men; and the judges of it are commonly blinded by their lusts, or hoodwinked by bribery, so that they frequently oppress and persecute the righteous. Yet God gives them their power, and allows them to prosper in their crimes, by which they are still further blinded and hardened. And who is he that can deny these facts? or maintain, in the view of them, that this is a state of exact retribution? (Notes, xii. 6-10. xxi. 7-22. Ps. xvii. 13-15. lxxiii. 1-14. Jer. xii. 1-4. Mal. iii. 13-18.)

V. 25-35. Here Job again renewed his complaints, with the same incoherence and conflict of contending passions as before. He regarded his life, as having suddenly come to a wretched end; and with speed that surpassed that of the swiftest runner, who hasted to convey important tidings, (Note, 2 Chr. xxx. 6-9.) or, that of the swiftest ships, and even that of the eagle hasting to the prey. All his efforts to rise superior to the tumult of his passions were unavailing; he could not but fear even worse than he had suffered; and as he was indeed a sinner, and his friends condemned him, he was alarmed lest God should finally reject him. If indeed he were a wicked man, it would be labour in vain to vindicate his character: for when he had done all in his power for that purpose, God would detect his secret iniquities, and thus thrust him as it were into the mire, till his very garments rendered him abhorred. Nay, though he were not a wicked man, yet the discovery of all his former sins, and of the defects of his present obedience, would shew him to be, "as an unclean thing, and his righteousnesses as filthy rags." (Note, Is. lxiv. 6-8.) Indeed, his loathsome disease, and his other afflictions, were interpreted by his friends as proofs of his guilt, and as God's plunging him in a ditch, and rendering him abominable; notwithstanding all the proof which he could give of his integrity. So that there was nothing to be attempted in so unequal a contest: there was no "daysman," or umpire, to decide upon the merits of the cause, whose authority might induce both parties to abide by his sentence: and he was so confused and terrified, that he could not make the best of his cause. If his afflictions and terrors were removed, he could then speak without fear: but as the case now stood, he might as well hold his peace. (Marg. Ref.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The justice, wisdom, truth, and goodness of God, must be taken for granted, whatever sentiments we defend or oppose; for "shall not the Judge of all the earth do right?"—But "how should man be just before God?" If he enter into judgment with us according to his holy law, not one action in a thousand can stand the test.—The wisdom, power, and sovereignty of God are displayed in the works of creation and providence: we may collect what he can do from what he hath done; and when these subjects are duly considered, they, who harden themselves against him in presumptuous wickedness, appear to be perfectly infatuated. How can they, who despise the favour and defy the vengeance of the Almighty, expect to prosper, or to escape final misery? But they are no less infatuated, who proudly attempt to justify themselves before that God, who possesses infinite purity and justice, and who knows us better than we know ourselves. He will prove every indictment which he hath brought, and vindicate every sentence which he hath denounced, against any of his creatures. It is therefore our only wisdom to supplicate mercy, and not to demand justice, from our Judge. Every attempt "to establish our own righteousness," forms an additional demonstration of our pride, perverseness, and rebellion. (Note, Rom. x. 1-4.) The Lord can produce against us innumerable transgressions, which have escaped our own notice, or recollection: he views us with an impartial eye, while we flatter ourselves in our own sight: he sees our iniquity to be hateful, when we are attempting to palliate it. (Note, Ps. xix. 12-14.) If then "we know nothing by ourselves, we are not thereby justified:" and it is far better to submit to his righteousness, than to argue, either against the sentence of his law, or the appointments of his providence, which unitedly testify against us. In like manner, all endeavours to vindicate our character, if indeed we are hypocrites, must be in vain: we shall soon appear as if newly plunged in the mire, and be exposed to shame and condemnation, without being able to plead any thing in our own behalf. But if consciously sincere, we may humbly maintain our integrity before our fellow-creatures; yet it is often lost labour, except as "by well-doing we put to silence the ignorance of foolish men." And it is commonly best to leave our cause with God, and patiently to bear the unjust suspicions of our brethren, till he sees good to remove the painful trial.—We should also be very careful not to be offended, either by the tribulations with which we meet, or the prosperity of the wicked; they have their short-lived pleasures, we our transient sorrows. Our lives are speeding away with unobserved swiftness, and soon their joys and our tears will be for ever done away. Yet, under severe trials and sharp temptations, it is very difficult to repress murmurs, to keep out hard thoughts of God, or to hold fast our confidence in him. When, through Satan's influence on the mind, the Lord appears as an enemy; when his power and justice are more distinguishable than his mercy; and when a sense of his displeasure, and slavish fears of condemnation preponderate, the soul, even of a believer, is filled with inexpressible confusion, and verges to melancholy and despair. It is easy to counsel those who are in such a case, but who can then practise as he ought? Every object enhances terror, every topic suggests new disquietude; the trembling and tempted soul forgets, or dares not appropriate, the promises; every precept, threatening, warning, or example, seems to be pointed against him; and he scarcely ventures to approach, or knows not how to speak, before the mercy-seat, where once he communed with his God in the spirit of adoption, with confidence and comfort. "This is indeed the time of Jacob's trouble, but he shall be delivered out of it." We may be thankful, if we have not known these waves and billows of dire temptations; yet we shall scarcely know how to sympathize with those that are conflicting with them, or to make proper allowances for them. But, poor tempest-tossed soul, consider Job, and notice that others have passed this dreadful gulf before thee; and though they could not believe that God would hear or deliver them any more, yet he rebuked the storm, and brought them to the desired haven. And look to Jesus, who, though free from sin, once "suffered being tempted, that he might be able to succour such as are tempted." "Resist then the devil, steadfast in the faith;" give not place to hard thoughts of God, or desperate conclusions about thyself; repress, as much as possible, every rising passionate wish or expression. Come to him, who invites "the weary and heavy laden,"

CHAP. X.

Job entreas God to shew on what account he contended with him; and pleads for compassion as from his Creator, 1-13. He states, that his sins were strictly marked and rigorously punished, 14-17. He repines, that he had ever been born, or had not died immediately after; and craves respite from pain to prepare for death, 18-22.

5 Are thy days as the days of man? are thy years as man's days, and hath promised "in no wise to cast out those who come," but "to give rest to their souls;" plead guilty; cast thyself upon unmerited mercy, as if this were thy first approach to a forgiving God, without deciding any thing about thy former experience or character: acknowledge that thy sufferings are less than thy sins have deserved: cry for repentance, for faith, for patience, for inward support; and wait thus at mercy's gate. There can indeed be no superior, who, as umpire, can lay his hand on both parties: yet remember that there is an appointed Mediator, "an Advocate with the Father," who "is able to save to the uttermost all them who come to God by him; seeing he ever liveth to make intercession for them," according to the will of God: and that those who believe on him, are washed and justified from all their sins, and will soon be saved from all their troubles. In this way, thou shalt ere long find, that the tempter is rebuked, the storm is over, thy sun breaks forth; yea, thou shalt yet sing, "O Lord, I will praise thee; though thou wast angry with me, thine anger is turned away, and thou comfortest me." (Note, Is. xii. 1-3.)—Oh, how happy is a believer, even in such trying circumstances, compared with those prosperous sinners, to whom it will shortly be said, "Remember that thou in thy life-time receivest thy good things, and Lazarus evil things; but now he is comforted, and thou art tormented!"

NOTES.

CHAP. X. V. 1, 2. The vehemence of Job's passions, excited by his exquisite sufferings, here again broke through his better purposes; and he was urged to seek relief by complaining "in the bitterness of his soul," whatever the consequence might be; he would cease from silently musing on his misery, and would give utterance to his inward anguish.—Perhaps, "his soul being weary of life," he wished to bring some sudden judgment on himself, which might at once end his days. Yet he would still beg of God not to account him, or finally to deal with him, as a wicked man; but to shew him on what account he acted with such extreme rigour towards one of his upright worshippers.

V. 3. It may be supposed that Job was at a loss what to think of the Divine dispensations towards him. He could not conceive that God would oppress his creatures by punishing them without cause, as if he despised the work of his own hands, and took pleasure in destroying or disgracing it; yet he was not able to understand how these things could consist with the goodness and mercy of God; and he supposed that his remarkable afflictions would tend to encourage the counsels and practices of wicked men, who often argue that there is no advantage in religion, and therefore seek happiness in the world by an ungodly life. (Note, xxi. 7-16.)

V. 4-7. Man's eyes see partially, superficially, and gradually; and his days are transient, so that he must make haste, or he may not find time to effect his purposes; but the case is entirely different with the everlasting, omniscient, and holy God. He could have detected Job's iniquity if he were guilty, without putting him to the torture, to extort a confession; and he had space to bring him to the trial, and to convict him, before he proceeded to punish. He could not therefore comprehend what God meant by thus afflicting him; as he could appeal to him that he had not been wicked, that is, an impenitent unconverted sinner; a hypocrite in religion, and one who used it as a cloak to cover his iniquities. If, however, God, in sovereignty, was pleased to punish him, he knew it was in vain to contend with him, for none could deliver him out of his hands.

12 Thou hast granted me life and favour, and thy visitation hath preserved my spirit.

13 And these things hast thou hid in thine heart: I know that this is with thee.

14 If I sin, then thou markest me, and thou wilt not acquit me from mine iniquity.

15 If I be wicked, woe unto me; and if I be righteous, yet will I not lift up my head. I am full of confusion; therefore see thou mine affliction, 16 For it increaseth: thou huntest me as a fierce lion; and again thou shewest thyself marvellous upon me.

17 Thou renewest thy witnesses against me, and increasest thine indignation upon me; changes and war are against me.

18 Wherefore then hast thou brought me forth out of the womb? Oh that I had given up the ghost, and no eye had seen me!

19 I should have been as though I had not been; I should have been carried from the womb to the grave.

20 Are not my days few? cease then, and let me alone, that I may take comfort a little,

21 Before I go whence I shall not return, even to the land of darkness and the shadow of death;

22 A land of darkness, as darkness itself; and of the shadow of death, without any order, and where the light is as darkness.

V. 8-13. In these verses Job expostulates with God, as if he had created him only for misery. The very hands which had fashioned him, (as the potter moulds the clay on all sides, till he has formed the vessel which he intended,) now heavily afflicted him, and were about to destroy him, and reduce him to his original dust.—He then gave an accurate account of his wonderful formation in the womb; when, from his original liquid form, he was gradually coagulated, as milk is curdled into cheese; and when the skin and the flesh covered him, till at length he was supported and braced by bones and sinews. To this material substance God hath given life, and a rational soul; and thus he had been born into the world, and had ever since been protected, and favoured with a variety of comforts; and could the Lord have created, preserved, and prospered him, only to render his downfall the more dreadful, and his miseries more extreme? Yet all his sufferings must have been the result of a secret purpose thus to overwhelm him, and the event in like manner was known to God alone.

V. 14-17. Job did not deny that, as a sinner, he deserved his sufferings, but he thought that justice was executed upon him with peculiar rigour, that every sin was noticed, and that God would not mercifully acquit him from his iniquity. If, indeed, he were a wicked man, a notorious sinner, and hypocritical in his religion, his case must be dreadful; nay, if righteous, or an upright worshipper of God, he was so crushed and dismayed, that he should not dare to look up for mercy. Indeed, he was full of confusion, and knew not what to think of his extraordinary case; yet he begged of God to notice his increasing affliction, and no longer to pursue him with his judgments and terrors, as the fierce lion hunts the trembling fugitive, nor to act towards him in so wonderful a manner. For every affliction was a witness of the Divine indignation against him, and nothing but changes of one misery for another awaited him, against whom God himself, and the whole creation, seemed to be at war.—The gloom, unbelief, and hard thoughts of God, which are here discernible, ought to be ascribed as much to Satan's temptations, and Job's inward anguish of soul, as to his outward trials and remaining depravity.—The words rendered, "I am full of confusion," (15.) may be translated, "Oh! be satisfied with my confusion," or disgrace.

V. 18-22. Job here, more directly than before, expostulated with God for giving him his being, and for not cutting him off by death in the womb, or as soon as born. (Notes, iii.) He considered death as at hand, and he begged a little respite from his anguish, that he might prepare for that closing scene; and for removing to the country whence he should not return. The description that follows, seems to be only intended for the grave, and not to relate to the invisible world.—Coherency, or exactness, in the discourse of one who spoke in the bitterness of his spirit, was not to be expected; yet Job certainly believed that there would be a future state, and had some hope of happiness in it, though now exceedingly clouded and discouraged. But he here described the state of dead bodies in the grave, as darkness and disorder; and he used many repetitions, meaning, in general, that they know nothing of the vicissitudes of day and night, or of the orders established among the living; and that men are cited thither, and arranged there, without respect to age, rank, or character.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1-7. As afflictions may speedily render us weary of life, how needful is it to have our treasure in heaven, and to be prepared for death! Yet we should

CHAP. XI.

Zophar sharply rebukes Job for justifying himself; and earnestly desires that God would answer him, 1-8. He shews that God is unsearchable, and man ignorant and presumptuous, 7-12. He reminds Job that repentance is the only way of recovering comfort and prosperity, 13-20.

V. 13-25. The transition from the foregoing verse to the subsequent discourse seems as follows. The consideration, that "length of days" among men was supposed to increase wisdom and understanding, led Job to think of the everlasting God, whose wisdom and knowledge are infinite; and thus, without mentioning him, he proceeded to expatiate on his perfections and dispensations; shewing that he believed the same general truths as his friends did, and could discourse upon them with cogency and fluency. (Notes, v. 8-16)

16 With <sup>him</sup> is strength and wisdom: <sup>the</sup> deceived and the deceiver are his.

19 He <sup>leadeth</sup> princes away spoiled, and overthroweth the mighty.

20 He removeth away <sup>the</sup> speech of the trusty, and <sup>taketh</sup> away the understanding of the aged.

21 He <sup>poureth</sup> contempt upon princes, and weakeneth the strength of the mighty.

22 He <sup>discovereth</sup> deep things out of darkness, and <sup>bringeth</sup> out to light the shadow of death.

23 He <sup>increaseth</sup> the nations, and destroyeth them: he enlargeth the nations, and <sup>straiteneth</sup> them again.

24 He <sup>taketh</sup> away the heart of the chief of the people of the earth, and causeth them to wander in a wilderness where there is no way.

25 They <sup>m</sup>grope in the dark without light, and he <sup>maketh</sup> them to <sup>stagger</sup> like a drunken man.

xi. 7—12.) He declared God to be the fountain of knowledge, wisdom, and power; and that his providence rules the world with irresistible authority. He destroys cities, and imprisons the inhabitants; he afflicts the land with drought, or destroys them with a deluge, as he did the earth in the days of Noah. (Notes, Gen. vii.) The crafty deceivers, and they who are deluded by them, fall in with his universal plan for his own glory; and even Satan, the great deceiver, accomplishes the purposes of God by his malignant endeavours to defeat them! Kings, legislators, conquerors, orators, are spoiled, disgraced, enslaved, overthrown, infatuated, beyond all expectation, as the Lord pleases; and they are sure to be at length rendered contemptible when they oppose his cause. (Notes, Is. ii. 10—18. xlii. 8, 9. Dan. iv. 34—37. Acts xii. 20—23.) He detects the most secret conspiracies, and the deepest intrigues of princes; he disposes of nations with absolute authority; and when any stand in his way, he throws them into such confusion, that they are perfectly bewildered, as if lost in a desert, or groping in the dark, or staggering from drunkenness; and thus they become incapable of the least effectual exertion.—These important truths were suited to convince the over-confident disputants, that they had gone out of their depth, in attempting to assign the Lord's reason for afflicting Job; when "his ways are unsearchable, and his judgments past finding out." (Note, Rom. xi. 33—36.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—10. Reviling, railery, and boasting commonly prove infectious; and when we overrate ourselves, and court admiration, others will be disposed to undervalue us, and treat us with contempt. Whatever some men fancy, there was good sense, sound reasoning, true knowledge, and heavenly wisdom in the world, before they were born; and the world will not be left in the dark, when these luminaries are set, and their labours also consigned to oblivion. Nay, when wise and good men die, blessed be God, wisdom does not die with them, but others are raised up in their places.—We have all a right to judge for ourselves, being endued with understanding as well as others; and we should neither claim superiority over them, nor in this respect yield it to them; for we are cautioned by our Lord on both sides, when he says, "Call no man father upon earth; neither be ye called masters;" but in other matters our rule is, in honour to prefer others, and to sit down in the lowest place; and it is seldom wise or becoming to deviate from it. (Notes, Matt. xxiii. 8—10. Luke xiv. 7—11.)—The most pious and conscientious men have generally been treated with contempt by worldly persons; and sometimes by their brethren, who ought to have sympathized in their sorrows, borne with their infirmities, and helped them with their prayers. But if men despise them, let them but call upon God, and he will answer them.—Adversity and poverty, in this evil world, eclipse the light of wisdom and piety; and many, who once were honourable and useful, have sunk into contempt, when fallen under misfortunes, and become indigent.—Yet, worldly prosperity is of small value in the sight of God. He hath superior blessings for his children; and commonly he gives carnal things abundantly into the hands of those, whose pride, luxury, and impiety are increased by them.—The whole creation groans, as in unnatural bondage to the lusts of men. Every creature preaches the goodness of God, and the ungrateful abuse of man, and testifies that this is a state of probation, not of retribution.

V. 11—25. The faculties of our souls were originally formed, as capable of discerning truth and falsehood, as our bodily senses are of discriminating their objects.—Observation and experience should teach us wisdom. But, through our depravity, and the influence of our passions, we draw wrong conclusions, make a perverse choice, and often wander farther from God and true wisdom, with increasing years. Yet, when renewed by the Holy Spirit, we begin to use

CHAP. XIII.

Job, confident of his knowledge, appeals to God: disdainfully and peevishly reproves his friends, for pleading against him with false reasonings and partiality; and warns them to fear the judgment of God, 1—13. In extreme suffering, and expecting death, he professes confidence that God would justify him, 14—19. He craves respite, and desires to know his sins, and why God dealt so rigorously with him, 20—25.

2 What <sup>ye</sup> know, the same do I know also: I am not inferior unto you.

3 Surely <sup>I</sup> would speak to the Almighty, and <sup>I</sup> desire to reason with God.

4 But <sup>ye</sup> are forgers of lies, ye are all <sup>physicians</sup> of no value.

5 Oh! <sup>that</sup> ye would altogether hold your peace; and it should be <sup>your</sup> wisdom.

6 Hear <sup>now</sup> my reasoning, and hearken to the pleadings of my lips.

7 Will ye <sup>speak</sup> wickedly for God? and talk deceitfully for him?

8 Will ye <sup>accept</sup> his person? will ye contend for God?

9 Is it good that he should <sup>search</sup> you out? or <sup>as</sup> one man mocketh another, do ye so mock him?

10 He will surely <sup>reprove</sup> you, if ye do secretly accept persons.

11 Shall <sup>not</sup> his excellency make you afraid? and <sup>his</sup> dread fall upon you?

our faculties aright; we receive wisdom from the Fountain-head, by faith and prayer; we learn useful lessons from all we see and experience; and acquire a spiritual taste, which savours truth and holiness, and is of use every hour of our lives. (Note, Heb. v. 11—14.) May we seek more and more to have "the eyes of our understanding thus enlightened," and "our senses exercised, by reason of use, to discern both good and evil!"—It is a main point of wisdom to set God always before us, to observe his working in every thing, and to feel our own absolute dependence on him. "He doeth what he will in the armies of heaven, and among the inhabitants of the earth, and none can stay his hand, or say unto him, What doest thou?" He creates or destroys, he exalts or depresses, kings or nations as he pleases. (Notes, 1 Sam. ii. 3—8.) All the power and policy of earth and hell cannot conceal anything from him, or carry one point against him. All creatures subserve his purposes, and assist in accomplishing his vast designs. But they who break his commandments, and, depending on their power, wisdom, or dignity, exalt themselves against his cause, and rebel against his authority, after having been constrained, contrary to their intention, to subserve his plan, shall be cast off with indignation, and rendered contemptible and miserable; while such as submit to his authority, and trust in his mercy, obey his precepts, and aim to promote his cause and honour in the world; fall in with his designs according to his revealed will, and yield themselves to his disposal; shall be taken care of by the way, and at the end shall be graciously received, with, "Well done, good and faithful servant, enter thou into the joy of thy Lord." May this be our choice, our conduct, and our felicity!

NOTES.

CHAP. XIII. V. 1, 2. With manifest self-preference, Job here declared, that the discoveries of God's providential dealings with men, which he had stated, were the result of his own exact and careful observation; and that he understood these matters better than his friends did, and therefore did not want their instructions. (Note, xii. 1, 2.)

V. 3—6. An improper boldness is discernible in the discourses of Job, for which Elihu afterward reproved him: (Notes, xxxiii. 8—13. xxxiv. 5—9.) yet, he did not mean to justify himself before God, but only to obtain a verdict in his favour from him against his friends, who treated him as a hypocrite; accusing him of crimes which he had never committed, and arguing from false principles, respecting the Divine government of the world. They visited him indeed as physicians, in his distress; but by their improper treatment they irritated his disease. They would, therefore, do him the greatest favour in their power, and most shew their own wisdom, if they would hold their peace; and attend to his reasonings, from which they might learn to correct their own errors.

V. 7—12. The disputants meant to vindicate the Lord's dealings with Job, and to plead his cause; but they bore false-witness against their friend, and used deceitful reasonings in the argument. Now, if such practices were admitted, in pleading for a king against one of his subjects; it would be called "accepting his person," and be a reproach to the character of the king, and a disgrace to the cause. But God wanted not such advocates, nor did his conduct need vindicating by such means. Job therefore reminded his friends, that when their conduct should be searched out, it would appear very wicked and dishonourable to God; and that he would certainly rebuke them for condemning the innocent. If, indeed, they duly considered the majesty and excellency of God, they would be afraid of his indignation, while, under pretence of pleading his cause, they acted so contrary to his example; and it would better become them, to consider themselves as sinful dying creatures, whose bodies would speedily return to the earth, and whose remembrance would be buried in obscurity or oblivion.—Bishop Patrick thus paraphrases the concluding verse, perhaps according to the true meaning of the original: 'Whose remonstrances on his behalf are no better than dust; and the arguments you accumulate, but like so many heaps of dirt.'

V. 13, 14. Perhaps Job's friends seemed about to interrupt him; or shewed apprehensions, that Divine judgment would come upon him for so pertinaciously attesting his innocence. 'Well,' says he, 'keep silence, let me speak, and I will risk all consequences; for my anguish is so excessive, that I could even gnaw my own flesh: and, as I am not conscious of any great crime for which I am thus punished, I would even venture my life to have this matter cleared up.' (Notes, vi. 8-13. vii. 9, 10.)

V. 15-19. The first clause in this passage may be properly rendered as an interrogation, 'Lo, he will slay me, shall not I trust?' or, 'though he should slay me, shall not I trust?' Our version is formed from a change in the text, on the authority of the Jewish writers, which, in this case, seems not at all necessary.—Even if left to die of his diseases, or to be cut off by a sudden stroke, Job determined not to give up his confidence.—His friends had intimated that the return of his prosperity would evince his former integrity, and his present repentance, (Notes, v. 18-27. viii. 20-22. xi. 13-20;) but he, conscious that he had walked uprightly before God, and having an assured belief of his faithfulness and mercy, would confide in him as his salvation, even though he slew him; and would maintain before him that he had not been a wicked dissembler, though he well knew that no hypocrite could escape detection or condemnation in his sight. He desired his friends to attend to his appeal, and to observe how he ordered his cause. He did not deny that he was a sinner, but he pleaded that he was not a hypocrite; from the charge of hypocrisy he knew that God would justify him, and he challenged them to bring forward the proofs of their allegations. He had lost all, except his character, the testimony of his conscience, and his hope in God, which they endeavoured to rend from him; and it would be death to him not to vindicate himself from their cruel aspersions.—'For now, I shall be silent, and expire.'

V. 20-23. Job here addressed himself to God, and begged of him to try his cause. Provided his outward pains, and his inward horror, were removed, so that the Divine majesty did not overwhelm him, he was confident he could plead effectually in his own behalf; and he would either propose or answer questions relative to his case, as the Lord pleased. In the first instance, he desired to know how many his iniquities were; and especially he wished to discover what that transgression was, which had brought his present calamities upon him. It is probable that Job intended this merely as an appeal to God, that it was not hypocrisy, or gross oppression; yet the address was querulous and passionate, and when the Lord actually spake, Job found he could not answer him. (Notes, xl. 1-5. xlii. 1-6.)—'O God, I cannot accuse myself of wilful wickedness against thee; but if there be any secret iniquity that I am not privy to, do thou make it known to me, and convince me of it.' (Bp. Hall. Note, x. 1, 2. Ps. cxxxix. 23, 24.)

V. 24-28. As the Lord neither removed Job's pains, nor vindicated his character, nor comforted his soul, he considered him as hiding his face in anger, and holding him as an enemy. And he pleaded, that this was beneath the infinite Majesty of Heaven, seeing he was so mean and frail, and at the point of death, as a withered leaf, or dry stubble, the sport of the winds, and fuel for the flame. (Note, vii. 17-19.) He thought that God framed more severe decrees against him, and inflicted on him more bitter things, than upon any one else; and as he was conscious that, during his maturer years, he had uprightly served the Lord, he supposed that his youthful iniquities, previous to his conversion, were now remembered against him, and that he possessed them in their painful effects. For, it was evident that Divine judgments confined him as a prisoner in the stocks till his conduct had been examined, and evidence against him sought after; and that the prints of God's displeasure were marked upon his whole body, even to the soles of his feet, (ii. 7;) inasmuch that it, (not he,) was consuming, as a putrifying carcase, and wearing away as a moth-eaten garment. (Notes, ii. 7, 8. xix. 15-31. Num. xii. 11-13.)—In these complaints we discern the effects of strong temptations, and remaining depravity; yet, in this chapter Job expresses a regard to God in every thing, shews lively exercises of faith, hope, and confidence in him, and gives many evidences of a sound judgment, and a tender conscience.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1-12. It is very difficult for man to possess superior talents, without some appearance of ostentation and self-preference; yet, to be "clothed with humility," confers a peculiar gracefulness upon wisdom, knowledge, and every shining quality.—In all our troubles of mind and conscience, we generally find men to be physicians of no value. They often either mistake our case, or attribute our distress to a wrong cause, or prescribe pernicious remedies, and by one means or other increase our malady. But when the conscience is wounded, and the heart dismayed with the fear of wrath, the prevalence of sin, the force of temptation, or the weight of affliction, we should apply to the Physician of our souls; whose knowledge, power, and love, are infinite, who never rejects any sincere application, and who never leaves any case uncured. To him we may speak, and before him we may spread our case, at all times, which is a peculiar comfort when we meet with harsh treatment from man; and though we are sinners, and have committed numberless offences, yet, if our heart condemn us not of hypocrisy, we may have humble confidence before him. (Note, 1 John iii. 18-24.)—Sometimes the greatest comfort that we can afford the afflicted, consists in patiently attending to their complaints; and when we do not understand the subject in debate, or see that others know more of it than we do, or are eager to be heard, it is our wisdom altogether to hold our peace, in hopes to get some good when we cannot do any.—Deceit and iniquity are doubly base, when employed in the professed cause of truth and piety; because they seem to imply that religion needs to be supported by such disgraceful means. But the God of truth and love can never approve the conduct of those who slander, deceive, or persecute their brethren, under pretence of doing him service. Such conduct, when searched into, appears an impious mockery of God, and springs from the basest motives, however secret they are kept. He will therefore surely reprove the offenders; and a due attention to the holy excellency of his character would fill with terror of his vengeance, all those who ignorantly hope for his favour in any unhallowed attempts to serve him.

V. 13-28. In this evil world, considering how frail we are, and how short our time is, we may find enough to employ us, without falsely accusing and reviling our brethren.—Under every affliction, we should aim to keep up a confidence in the Divine mercy, which will preserve us under the most exquisite agonies from doing ourselves any harm.—Though outward evils, and inward distresses, should unite in our case, and continue unabated till death, a strong and active faith, an acquaintance with the scriptural ground of a believer's hope, and conscious integrity, may enable the poor tempted soul to trust in the Lord, and to expect salvation from him. The upright may maintain his cause before him, and be assured that he will be justified; but no hypocrite can come with acceptance before him, or find admission into his kingdom; yet it is best to repress our vehement passions, and to wait his time of clearing our aspersed characters; though, to sit down under some slanders, without attempting our own vindication, be almost as the pangs of death to us: and, indeed, it is very cruel to bereave an afflicted man of his reputation, or to endeavour to discourage his hope in God, without any evidence of his guilt.—It is very desirable to have a clear conscience, and an assurance of God's favour; yet great humility and reverence become us in appealing unto him. He knows us better than we do ourselves; and we should humbly beseech him to bring us acquainted with our sins, that we may repent and seek forgiveness. But he who duly considers the number and heinousness of his transgressions, will not wonder that God hides his face and afflicts him; nor would he have cause to complain of injustice, if he treated him as an enemy. And, though we are mean as the dry leaf or the stubble, yet, being also guilty and polluted, and proper fuel for the fire of the Lord's indignation, it would not be dishonourable to him, if he were to pursue us to destruction. Sins long since forgotten by us, stand recorded in his book, the guilt of which no time can obliterate; while old age often possesses the iniquities of youth, by bodily diseases, ruined circumstances, bad habits, a guilty conscience, or rebellious children; and it is a mercy, if final condemnation be escaped.—Should God mark our steps, and narrowly examine our paths, we could in no wise stand before him in judgment; he would indeed "write bitter things against us," and both body and soul would eternally be filled with the print of his righteous vengeance. This will be the awful case of unbelievers; but there is salvation provided and revealed, not from temporal sorrows, (for our bodies must still return to the dust, and perish as a garment that is moth-eaten,) but from the wrath to come. For when the believer, whose sins are washed away in the blood of Christ, shall be laid in the grave, his soul will find admission into the realms of glory, and his body shall at length also arise incorruptible and immortal. Seeking first this eternal salvation, let us bear our present trials without a murmur; let us often humble ourselves anew for sins long since committed and repented of, and look forward to death as the period of all our sorrows. And let young persons beware of indulging themselves in sin: for even in this world they may so possess the iniquities of their youth, as to have months of sorrow for moments of pleasure. (Note, John v. 10-15. P. O. 1-14. conclusion.)—Their wisdom and duty, therefore, consist in remembering their Creator in their early days, that they may have assured hope and sweet peace of conscience, as the solace of their declining years. (Note, Ec. xii. 1.)

CHAP. XIV.

Job pleads with God for relief, because of the shortness and misery of life, and the sinfulness of human nature, 1-6. Viewing death as destructive to all earthly hopes, he yet desires to be hid in the grave, and determines to wait the time appointed for his change, 7-15. He complains that God dealt severely with him; and shews that all things on earth, and men especially, are subject to corruption, 16-22.

NOTES.

CHAP. XIV. V. 1-6. Job, perhaps perceiving that his friends disregarded him, continued his discourse, by decanting upon the condition of man, and interspersing addresses unto God. He observed, that every man born of Adam's race, is short-lived, and exposed to manifold afflictions: all his beauty, felicity, splendour, and gaiety, fall before the stroke of sickness or of death, as the gaudy flower before the scythe; or they pass away like the fleeting shadow. (Notes, Ps. c. 3-6. xcii. 6, 7. 12. ciii. 15-18. Is. xl. 6-8. Jam. i. 9-11. 1 Pet. i. 24, 25.) He then expostulated with God, for noticing, or judging with such severity, a poor creature beneath his regard. (Notes, vii. 17-19. xiii. 24-28.) He was indeed a sinner, being descended from sinful parents, as all other men were: even as, in the whole course of nature, the progeny partake of the propensities and qualities of the creature, whence it sprang. "For who can bring a clean thing out of an unclean? Not one." Or, how could it be possible for his conduct to be sinless, when his heart was by nature polluted and unclean? In either sense, this forms a decisive testimony, that Job understood and believed the doctrine of original sin; and though he did not apply it, in so humble and pious a manner, as David afterwards did, (Note, Ps. li. 5, 6;) yet he seems to have intended it as a plea, why the Lord should not deal with him according to his own works, but according to his promised mercy and grace.—Job proceeded to observe, that man's days were determined, and he could not exceed his appointed term of life; therefore he prayed that he might have a little rest from his exquisite anguish, till the wearisome work of life was over, and death should end his sorrows; which would be as welcome to him as night to the day-labourer.

V. 7-12. Though a tree be cut down, and the stump seem decayed in the earth, yet, if it be in a moist and fruitful situation, it may be expected that tender branches will shoot forth, and grow up as a newly planted tree, or as if the old tree again revived. But when a man is cut off by death, he is for ever removed from his place in this world; no one expects to see him again; and his body returns to the earth whence it was taken, and mingles with it; even as the waters return to the sea, whence they first came. Thus he lieth down, till the consummation of all things, when he shall awake at the general resurrection.—All these expressions imply Job's belief of that great doctrine; though both ancient and modern Sadducees have contrived to misunderstand him. Why else should he speak of death as "sleep," and mention a period to it

13 Oh! that thou wouldst <sup>e</sup>*hide me in the grave, that thou wouldst keep me secret, <sup>f</sup>*until thy wrath be past, that thou wouldst <sup>g</sup>*appoint me a set time, and <sup>h</sup>*remember me!

14 If a man die, <sup>i</sup>*shall he live again? <sup>j</sup>*all the days of my appointed time will I wait, till <sup>k</sup>*my change come.

15 Thou <sup>l</sup>*shalt call, and I will answer thee: <sup>m</sup>*thou wilt have a desire to the work of thine hands.

16 For now <sup>n</sup>*thou numberest my steps; dost thou not watch over my sin?

17 My transgression is <sup>o</sup>*sealed up in a bag, and thou sewest up mine iniquity.

20 Thou <sup>u</sup>*prevailest for ever against him, and he passeth: thou <sup>v</sup>*changest his countenance, and sendest him away.

22 But <sup>x</sup>*his flesh upon him shall have pain, and <sup>y</sup>*his soul within him shall mourn.

when he shall awake, even "when the heavens be no more?" (Marg. Ref.)—Either Job meant by these considerations to comfort himself with the hope of having soon and for ever done with this wretched world; or he used them as a plea, why God should grant him respite from trouble to prepare for death, the consequences of which are irreversible.

V. 13-15. Job here earnestly prayed that God would speedily terminate his sorrows, and hide him in the grave, till his fatherly displeasure were past, or the present storm subsided; that he would set a time when he would release him; or at present dismiss him, till the appointed period of the resurrection, and the general judgment, and then remember him in mercy. As, however, death would soon remove him hence, he determined to wait, in patience and hope, "all the days of his appointed time," till that change should take place: and to look forward in believing expectation to the resurrection, when God would call him forth out of the grave, and he would gladly answer; when he would appear to try his cause and justify him, and take delight in the work of his hands.—The change, or renovation, which shall take place, at the resurrection, seems principally intended. (Note, Phil. iii. 20, 21.)

V. 16-22. In the preceding verses Job spoke in some degree of faith and hope; but here despondency again prevails. He represents God as strictly scrutinizing his whole conduct, and collecting evidence against him, which he preserved as a treasure sealed or sewed up in a bag, that he might be punished with the utmost rigour. (Notes, Deut. xxii. 34, 35. Rom. ii. 4-6.) He would not say that God did him injustice, but he thought that he carried matters to extremity against him: and in that case he would certainly bring him to destruction, without remedy. For his indignation must ruin the happiness, and the hope, of the most prosperous and powerful; as an earthquake subverts the strongest mountains, or removes the solid rocks; or, if more gradually, yet effectually, as the waters wear away the stones, or wash away the earth and its productions from the high to the low grounds. Indeed, God irresistibly prevails against all who contend with him: by sickness or death he changes their countenances, and sends them away into misery: and when the body is full of pain, or the soul of terror at the approach of death, the poor sufferer cannot notice either the prosperity or the adversity of his family.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1-15. It is very useful, seriously to reflect on the shortness and uncertainty of human life; on the vanity and vexation of all human enjoyments: and on the fading nature of all worldly splendour, which hath neither substance nor continuance: that we may cease to expect happiness from earthly objects, and learn to "lay up our treasure in heaven." But it is still more interesting to advert properly to the cause, and the remedy, of these evils. "By one man sin entered into the world, and death by sin; and so death passed upon all men." We receive our nature through this corrupted channel, and all the powers of our soul are contaminated by it: for who can produce an holy offspring from an unholy stock? Indeed, the almighty power of God once formed the holy human nature of the Saviour, in the womb of a sinful woman: but that was above, and contrary to, the established order of nature, that he might appear "in the likeness of sinful flesh," and yet be without sin. All else are conceived, and shapen in iniquity: and we all early manifest an aversion to God and his holy service, and our actual transgressions soon become numerous.

CHAP. XV.

Eliphaz sharply reproves Job, as arrogant and impious, 1-13. He declares God's holiness and man's sinfulness, 14-16. He appeals to observation and tradition, in proof that the wicked are miserable in this world, 17-35.

THEN answered Eliphaz the Temanite, and said,
2 Should a wise man utter vain knowledge, and fill his belly with the east wind?

3 Should he reason with unprofitable talk? or with speeches wherewith he can do no good?

4 Yea, thou castest off fear, and restrainest prayer before God.

5 For thy mouth uttereth thine iniquity, and thou choosest the tongue of the crafty.

6 Thine own mouth condemneth thee, and not I:
yea, thine own lips testify against thee.

7 Art thou the first man that was born? or wast thou made before the hills?

8 Hast thou heard the secret of God? and dost thou restrain wisdom to thyself?

9 What knowest thou, that we know not? what understandest thou, which is not in us?

10 With us are both the grey-headed, and very aged men, much elder than thy father.

11 Are the consolations of God small with thee?
is there any secret thing with thee?

12 Why doth thine heart carry thee away? and what do thy eyes wink at,

13 That thou turnest thy spirit against God, and testest such words go out of thy mouth?

14 What is man, that he should be clean? and he which is born of a woman, that he should be righteous?

15 Behold, he putteth no trust in his saints; yea, the heavens are not clean in his sight.

16 How much more abominable and filthy is man, which drinketh iniquity like water!

17 I will shew thee, hear me; and that which I have seen I will declare;

18 Which wise men have told from their fathers, and have not hid it:

19 Unto whom alone the earth was given, and no stranger passed among them.

20 Wherefore do I not see signs of heaven, nor do I see the powers thereof?

21 Wherefore do I not see heaven opened, and stars descending?

22 Wherefore do I not see the light of the morning, nor the stars of the evening?

23 Wherefore do I not see the gates of heaven, nor the windows thereof?

24 Wherefore do I not see the powers of heaven,
nor the hosts thereof?

25 Wherefore do I not see the powers of heaven,
nor the hosts thereof?

26 Wherefore do I not see the powers of heaven,
nor the hosts thereof?

27 Wherefore do I not see the powers of heaven,
nor the hosts thereof?

28 Wherefore do I not see the powers of heaven,
nor the hosts thereof?

29 Wherefore do I not see the powers of heaven,
nor the hosts thereof?

30 Wherefore do I not see the powers of heaven,

31 Wherefore do I not see the powers of heaven,

32 Wherefore do I not see the powers of heaven,

33 Wherefore do I not see the powers of heaven,

So that unless we be born of the Spirit, no spiritually good thing dwells in us, or can proceed from us; and even the little good of the regenerate is greatly defiled. We should therefore learn to abase ourselves before God, as abominable and polluted creatures: we should cease from all dependence on our own works; deprecate the strictness and severity of the Divine judgment; and cast ourselves wholly on the mercy of our God, according to the new covenant of grace, through the mediation of our Divine Surety: and we should daily seek the renewing of the Holy Spirit, and look forward to heaven as the only place of perfect holiness and felicity.—As the number of our days and months is appointed, which we cannot exceed, we should both seize the present moment, and pray for the preservation of our faculties, and the composure of our minds, that we may prepare for eternity, and finish our measure of trials and services with comfort and acceptance; relying on the tender compassion of our heavenly Father, who remembereth that we are but dust. A span of life alone remains unto us; our duties are exceedingly important, in their consequences to ourselves, and to others: and if the opportunity be slipped, it will be irrecoverable for ever. Whatever then we find to do, let us do it heartily and immediately. (Note, Ec. ix. 10.) If our trials be heavy and many, they will not here last long; death will finally terminate all our earthly sorrows and comforts: yet that is but a sleep; the soul will continue to live and act; and the body will awake and live when the heavens shall be no more. (Notes, Dan. xii. 2, 3. 1 Thes. iv. 13-18.) If our sins be forgiven, and our hearts renewed unto holiness, heaven will be the rest of our souls, while our bodies will be secretly hid in the grave, from the malice of our enemies, and we shall feel no more pain from the corrections of our God. At the appointed time, he will again remember us; and then we shall find every cloud dispersed, and every frown removed. Then the Lord will call his sleeping saints, and they will answer him; they will arise incorruptible and glorious; they will be publicly justified, and manifested to be his children and heirs; he will shew his love to them and his delight in them, as the creatures of his power, and the subjects of his grace; and death shall be “swallowed up in victory.” A few more days of conflict and difficulty, and this change shall begin in death; when the soul, released from sin and sorrow, and perfected in holiness, will joyfully wait for the re-union of the body, and that last and complete eternal change, when “mortality shall be swallowed up of life.” For this appointed period let us wait with godly fear, with realizing faith and cheerful hope, with diligent preparation and patient continuance in well-doing; neither desirous of living, nor impatient of the troubles of life.

V. 16-22. We should on no account yield to the suggestions of Satan, or the dictates of unbelief, to conclude, that the Lord can deal even in rigorous justice with a sinner, who hath a hope of everlasting life; or that he intends the misery and condemnation of those who trust in his mercy, and who desire to know and do his will.—We should number our own steps, watch over our sins, and keep an exact account of our transgressions, that we may humbly seek forgiveness of them, and more highly value the salvation of the gospel; and if we thus “judge ourselves, we shall not be condemned of the Lord.” He may afflict us with salutary chastisements; disease may fill our flesh with pain, change our countenance, and wear us away; we may lose the comfort of our families and connexions, and every hope of earthly felicity: but our God will not send the believer away into the regions of darkness and despair; nay, he will receive him into the realms of eternal felicity.—But what a change awaits the prosperous unbeliever! When the appointed period arrives, a state of unmixed, unalterable, and eternal misery will succeed. How will he answer, when God shall call him to his tribunal? Then indeed will he find, though now he will not believe it, that God numbered all his steps, and watched over his sins, and kept an exact account of all his iniquities, which are sealed up as evidence to be produced against him at the day of trial. And if the light afflictions which are but for a moment, that God's own children suffer here, be so wearying and distressing, what will the vengeance be that he reserves for his determined enemies! The strength of mountains and rocks cannot stand before his indignation, or shelter sinners from it. Their hope will then be destroyed for ever. Where will then be their possessions, pleasures, and distinctions? All pass away, and come to nought! Their countenance will then change, when the Judge shall bid them “depart accursed into everlasting fire, prepared for the devil and his angels:” and when body and soul are thus filled with anguish, what comfort can they derive from the consideration, that their crimes aggrandized their families, and their estates descended to their posterity?—But the Lord is yet upon a mercy-seat, ready to be gracious:—“O that men were wise, that they understood these things, that they would consider their latter end!”

NOTES.

CHAP. XV. V. 1-13. Instead of being convinced by Job's reasoning, or softened by his pathetic complaints, Eliphaz, with increasing severity, led on a second attack on him. Job had been reputed a wise man: but Eliphaz asked, Whether it consisted with that character, to propagate such empty notions, and to satisfy his conscience with them; when they were as unfit for the purpose, as the unwholesome east wind would be to appease his hunger. Would any wise man reason with such inconclusive arguments?—Thus contemptuously did he speak concerning Job's discourse. Yet in fact his doctrine was true, his cause was good, and many of his observations very wise and pious.—Eliphaz next charged him with casting off the fear of God, and restraining prayer before him: either because he concluded from some hasty expressions, that Job had no reverence for God, and proudly refused to call upon him in his trouble; or, that his doctrine would embolden others to ungodliness with the hopes of impunity, or discourage them from prayer by representing religion as unprofitable.—“Truly thou makest void fear,” (or, the fear of God;) and diminishes meditation, (or, worship,) “before him.”—He further accused him with choosing craftily to cloak his iniquity with the semblance of piety; observing that there needed nothing more than his own words to convict and condemn him.—He next enquired, whether he were the first of men, or had existed before the creation? Whether he were of the secret council of God, or had engrossed all wisdom to himself. If not, why did he presume to know more than any of his friends; when they were themselves, or had on their side, much elder men than he, or even than his father? And he demanded, “Whether the consolations of God were small with him?” That is, whether the consolations, which they proposed to him, if penitent, were so small, that he should condemn them as “physicians of no value?” Or whether he had any better method of comfort and deliverance, which he kept secret from them? In short, Eliphaz expostulated with Job, for letting his own heart carry him into such arrogant behaviour to them, and into such daring impiety against God, as he had just uttered.—Temptation and anguish indeed had extorted several improper expressions from Job: but Eliphaz was evidently angry, because he did not confess himself a hypocrite; but argued against the decision of him and his friends, and treated their discourses with peevish neglect, as either false, or inapplicable to the case.

V. 14-16. (Notes, iv. 17-21. ix. 1-3. 14-21. xiv. 1-6.) The holy God puts no trust in his saints, his holy ones, or holy angels; nay, he sees defect and mutability in the heavens themselves, as well as in its inhabitants, some of whom kept not their first estate. How abominable then and filthy in his sight is man, even every one who is born of woman! For, it is evident that he naturally craves sinful indulgences with a greedy appetite, and seeks his satisfaction in them, as one, who is thirsty, desires and drinks down water with greediness and delight: and that he quenches his perverse thirst as often as it returns, even by the commission of the most abominable crimes. (Marg. Ref.)—This text forms a conclusive proof, that these disputants were deeply convinced of the doctrine of original sin, and the total depravity of human nature, as far as man is left to his own innate propensities. But, that doctrine could not fairly be made to bear on the point at issue; because Job did not attempt to justify himself from the charge of sinfulness, but merely from that of hypocrisy, or gross wickedness.

V. 17-35. Eliphaz here again laboured to confirm his position, that the righteous prosper, and the wicked are miserable, in this world. He stated, that this was not merely his own opinion, but a tradition received from their fathers, and which wise men had always approved and taught; and they especially,

23 He <sup>i</sup>'wandereth abroad for bread, <sup>j</sup>saying, Where is <sup>k</sup>it? he knoweth that <sup>l</sup>"the day of darkness is ready at his hand.

24 Trouble and <sup>m</sup>"anguish shall make him afraid; they shall prevail against him, <sup>n</sup>as a king ready to the battle.

25 For <sup>o</sup>he stretcheth out his hand against God, and <sup>p</sup>"strengtheneth himself against the Almighty.

28 And he dwelleth in <sup>u</sup>"desolate cities, <sup>v</sup>and in houses which no man inhabiteth, <sup>w</sup>"which are ready to become heaps.

29 He shall not be rich, <sup>x</sup>neither shall his substance continue, neither shall he prolong the perfection thereof upon the earth.

32 It shall be <sup>ae</sup>"accomplished before his time, <sup>af</sup>and his branch shall not be green.

33 He shall <sup>ag</sup>"shake off his unripe grape as the vine, <sup>ah</sup>and shall cast off his flower as the olive.

34 For <sup>ai</sup>"the congregation of hypocrites shall be desolate, and fire shall consume <sup>aj</sup>"the tabernacles of bribery.

37 Let <sup>ap</sup>"not him that is deceived <sup>aq</sup>"trust in vanity : for <sup>ar</sup>"vanity shall be his recompense.

38 It shall be <sup>as</sup>"accomplished before his time, <sup>at</sup>and his branch shall not be green.

45 He shall <sup>bi</sup>"shake off his unripe grape as the vine, <sup>bj</sup>and shall cast off his flower as the olive.

46 For <sup>bk</sup>"the congregation of hypocrites shall be desolate, and fire shall consume <sup>bl</sup>"the tabernacles of bribery.

49 Let <sup>br</sup>"not him that is deceived <sup>bs</sup>"trust in vanity : for <sup>bt</sup>"vanity shall be his recompense.

50 It shall be <sup>bu</sup>"accomplished before his time, <sup>bv</sup>and his branch shall not be green.

51 He shall <sup>bw</sup>"shake off his unripe grape as the vine, <sup>bx</sup>and shall cast off his flower as the olive.

52 For <sup>by</sup>"the congregation of hypocrites shall be desolate, and fire shall consume <sup>bz</sup>"the tabernacles of bribery.

53 They <sup>ca</sup>"conceive mischief, and bring forth <sup>cb</sup>"vanity, and their belly prepareth deceit.

Job reproves his friends, for their conduct towards him; and shews how he would have acted, if they had been afflicted as he was, 1—6. He pathetically describes his heavy and varied sorrows, 7—16. As a dying man, he appeals to God to attest his integrity, 17—22.

THEN Job answered and said,
2 I have <sup>a</sup>heard many such things: <sup>b</sup>"miserable comforters are ye all.

3 Shall <sup>c</sup>"vain words have an end? or <sup>d</sup>"what emboldeneth thee that thou answerest?

their growth on being contradicted; and charge those, who dissent from them, with arrogance, with pretending to be wiser than all mankind, or engrossing all knowledge to themselves; and when they would decide controversies by authority, and by their own superior age and experience. We should watch and pray against this indecent and self-sufficient spirit; and that we may not misrepresent men's words, nor accuse them without evidence.—In the worst estate of man on earth, he hath many unmerited comforts from God. No consolations can be had in trouble, but in the way of faith and prayer; no other secret can be found to heal a wounded conscience, and a broken heart, than the encouragements of the gospel; and, however proposed, they are worthy of our acceptance. Yet unmerited reproach and unseasonable severity may so embitter a man's spirit, that he cannot receive them from those, who have thus discomposed him.—But, alas! "what is man, that he should be clean," or righteous! Indeed, pious men in every age, and nation, who have differed in other things, have unanimously agreed, that our fallen nature is abominable and polluted, delighting in iniquity, and drinking it down with greediness. We may well then admire the patience of God in bearing with us; and still more his love to us, in the redemption which is in Jesus Christ, and the mercy and grace through him vouchsafed to all who believe.

V. 17—35. We should not despise the wisdom and the experience of pious persons in former ages, or the result of their observation: but neither authority, reputation, antiquity, or greatness, render men infallible.—The word of God evinces, that sinners are, and will be, miserable, in proportion to their crimes, unless they repent and obtain forgiveness. Yet the most wicked may sometimes live long in outward prosperity, and die without any remarkable catastrophe; (Notes, Ps. lxxiii. 4—9:) but the vexations of the world, and the thoughts of death and judgment, must fill them with pain and terror. Sometimes, they are cut off by premature death, reduced to unexpected poverty, or beset with dangers on every side; or their departure is attended with horror and anguish. Commonly a curse corrodes their ill-gotten treasures, and their families speedily decay and sink into obscurity: at all times, the wrath of God, as a consuming fire, is ready to fasten upon the dying sinner, and as a tempestuous wind to hurry him into the regions of darkness and despair. This must be the case of all, who live and die forgetful of God, and neglecting his salvation: but what will be the doom of those daring rebels, who strengthen themselves in direct opposition to his known will, his cause, and glory; and who prosecute their covetous, sensual, ambitious, or revengeful purposes, in contempt of his authority, and defiance of his vengeance; who grow insolent in prosperity, and desperate in adversity; and whose blasphemous impiety is connected with the most cruel oppression! Were it not notorious, it could scarcely have been conceived, that men could be so infatuated in their enmity against God. But "can their hands be strong, or their hearts endure," when He shall call them to his judgment-seat?—On the other hand, the righteous may be destitute, afflicted, and tormented, even until death: yet they shall be supported, comforted, and delivered; and the perfection of their felicity shall be prolonged for ever. Let none then deceive themselves, and trust in vanity: as a man sows so shall he also reap; and the whole company of the wicked, however distinguished, notwithstanding all their power and sagacity, shall perish for ever. But let us apply these truths to our own hearts and consciences, examine our own state and character by them, and cease uncandidly to judge and condemn our brethren.

NOTES.

CHAP. XVI. V. 1—3. Job here reproved Eliphaz, for repeating what was in itself uninteresting and inapplicable, and he decided that all his friends had proved themselves comforters who increased instead of diminishing his distress; whose exclusive authority and prosperity were the reward of their singular piety. It was their uniform observation, that wicked men passed through life in pain, and in constant dread of death: that if they prospered for a little time, some spoiler or murderer soon came upon them: that when they began to be distressed, they were driven to despair; and that in general they were speedily reduced to want and beggary; and had their trouble and anguish imbibed by the dread of impending vengeance, which would prevail against them as a victorious potentate. He did not mean that this was the case of every transgressor; but of the presumptuous rebel, who opposed the authority of God, arraigned his providence, and hardened his heart in defiance of his wrath; who was rendered insolent and secure by prosperity; and who became outrageous in adversity, as if he would run upon the Almighty like a desperate warrior, who rushes upon certain death, that he may attempt revenge upon his enemy. He meant the man, whose impiety was connected with rapine and oppression; by whom whole cities had been desolated, and then occupied. The ill-gotten wealth of such a person would never continue, nor the perfection of his prosperity be prolonged. The wrath of God, like a consuming fire, would destroy him root and branch; or, like a tempestuous wind, would drive him away into darkness and despair. Let not then any one, who had gloried in such false confidences, continue to deceive himself; since disappointment and vexation would be his recompense, and his prosperity, and offspring, would come to an untimely end. For hypocrites, however numerous, would be exposed and ruined; and unjust judges, who had amassed riches by bribery, would be consumed. They had conceived mischief and contrived deceit and fraud: and they would find themselves deceived and cheated, with the shadow of happiness and the reality of misery.—Many important truths were contained in this discourse: but, as far as it related to temporal prosperity, or adversity, it admitted of numerous exceptions: and it implied an invidious application to the case of Job. It was evidently intimated, that he was the prosperous sinner, the presumptuous offender, the desperate rebel against God, the oppressor, the hypocrite, the corrupt judge; the ruin of his substance and family, his inward terror and anguish, were so many demonstrations of his guilt; and his vindication of himself completed the evidence, and almost constituted him a blasphemer, as if he charged the Lord with injustice, and set himself in array against him.—Thus Eliphaz inadvertently took the part of Satan; and brought in a verdict against Job, as if he had actually and openly cursed God. (Notes, i. 9—11. iv. 1.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—16. It is easier to answer, than to convince, an opponent: yet when arguments fail, contempt and railing generally most abound; for far more are capable of slander and declamation, than of reasoning with cogency and temper.—"The wisdom which is from above," teaches us to consider the tendency and effect of our knowledge, and renders us careful not to satisfy ourselves, or amuse others, with unprofitable notions, empty words, or delusive arguments. Every investigation of divine truth, should be conducted in the fear of God, and with fervent prayer: and whatever encourages men in sin, or discourages their approach to the mercy-seat of God, must be false and pernicious. Yet prejudiced and angry disputers frequently charge consequences upon their opponents, which are not fairly deducible from their tenets; and accuse them of those crimes which they abhor.—Men's own mouths often proclaim their iniquity; and even betray the secret hypocrisy of their hearts: yet they, who are forward to make others "offenders for a word," are commonly found most guilty, and in judging others condemn themselves; and we should carefully distinguish between the language of infirmity and temptation, and that of deliberate impiety. It is common for men to exclaim against the pride of others, when their own pride most manifestly prevails: this is evident, when my soul's stead, I could 'heap up words against you, and 'shake mine head at you.

5 But 'I would strengthen you with my mouth, and the moving of my lips should assuage your grief.

6 Though I speak, 'my grief is not assuaged: and though I forbear, 'what am I eased?

7 But now 'he hath made me weary; thou 'hast made desolate all my company.

8 And thou hast filled me with wrinkles, which 'is a witness against me: and 'my leanness rising up in me beareth witness to my face.

9 He 'teareth me in his wrath, who hateth me: 'he gnasheth upon me with his teeth; 'mine enemy sharpeneth his eyes upon me.

10 They have 'gaped upon me with their mouth: 'they have smitten me upon the cheek reproachfully: 'they have gathered themselves together against me.

11 God hath 'delivered me 'to the ungodly, and 'turned me over into the hands of the wicked.

12 I was 'at ease, but he hath 'broken me asunder: he hath also taken me 'by my neck, and 'shaken me to pieces, and 'set me up for his mark.

for they had reproached him without ceasing, instead of giving him any suitable encouragement. He was surprised, that they would proceed with such empty discourse; and that Eliphaz should have the courage, or rather harshness, to reply, after he and his associates had been so completely refuted.—If we consider the speech of Eliphaz abstractedly, Job undervalued it: but as it related to the matter in debate, he must be allowed to have had some reason for what he said.

V. 4, 5. A very pathetic turn is here given to the discourse. Had Job been in health, at ease, and prosperous, and his friends sick, bereaved, destitute, and tempted, he could have despised and reviled them very readily: but how would they have taken it? He would, however, have scorned to behave in such a manner; on the contrary, he would have suggested topics of consolation, to strengthen their patience, and to assuage their grief, with the encouraging hope of a happy event to their afflictions.

V. 6—16. These verses contain most grievous complaints, and many harsh expressions, which may easily be accounted for, but cannot be justified.—Job began by observing that he could obtain no relief, either by silence or by speaking; as all he said was misrepresented, and exposed him to further reproach. He declared that He, God himself, "had made him weary," even of his life: and then, turning his discourse to him, he further complained, that he had destroyed his family, dispersed all his companions, and so left his friends to mistake his case, that they had become his tormentors. He had likewise disfigured and wasted his body with dire diseases, so that his wrinkles and leanness were witnesses against him. Job next spoke of "his enemy, who hated him, tare him, and gnashed upon him" with insulting rage, and looked upon him as about to devour him. But it is not certain whether he intended this of the severity with which Eliphaz had treated him; or whether he meant Satan, who doubtless assaulted him with every horrid and terrifying temptation to drive him to despair; or whether he thus spoke of God, as become his enemy. (Marg. Ref.) He, however, meant his friends, when he spoke of those, who "gaped upon him with their mouth, smote him on the cheek reproachfully, and gathered themselves together against him;" (or, "filled themselves against him," that is, fully gratified their ill-will;) referring to their unanimous accusations, by which they wounded his spirit, and exposed his character to disgrace.—He then complained that God had delivered him into the hands of wicked men: the Sabaeans and Chaldeans had seized his substance; and his friends persecuted him, as if they had been ungodly men, nor could he obtain the least redress. Nay, the Lord himself brake him asunder, seizing upon him, and shaking him, as a strong man, when greatly enraged, would seize and shake one that was feeble and helpless: he had set him up as a mark, at which all the executioners of his vengeance were required to shoot their arrows; so that he was wounded in his vitals, and broken with renewed afflictions; and the Almighty seemed to run upon him with irresistible force and fury, as a giant or a mighty warrior upon one who dared not to oppose him. He had therefore assumed the garb of a mourner and a penitent; and the sackcloth, which he had put on, stuck to him as if sewed to his skin; his honour and authority were turned into deep disgrace; he was disfigured with incessant weeping; and death seemed ready to close his eyes. (Notes, i. 16—22. ii. 7—13. vi. 1—4. x. 14—17. xii. 24—28.)

V. 17—22. It should be recollected, that Job did not mean to deny he was a sinner, but he solemnly protested that he had not been an unjust oppressor, or a hypocrite; and if he had shed any innocent blood, he called upon the earth no longer to cover it, but to disclose it, that he might be openly convicted. In that case he allowed that he should have no right to compassion from man, or to expect that God would regard his cry for deliverance; but he was assured that He who dwelleth in the heavens, knew his innocence, and would be a witness in his behalf. His friends, indeed, "despised him," but he prayed, with weeping, before a merciful God; and he desired greatly that he could have access to him, and have his cause pleaded before him, as one pleadeth for another before the tribunal of earthly princes; that he might have his injured character vindicated, before the appointed years of his life were ended, which had been but few, and were now, as he thought, very soon to be closed.—The word rendered "scorn me," (20,) or, (my scorers, Marg.) sometimes is used in a favourable sense. It is translated, "an interpreter;" (xxiii. 23. Gen. xlii. 23;) and some think it may signify a mediator.—Thus the passage may be rendered, "My Mediator is my friend; my eye poureth out tears unto God. And one is pleading for man to God, and the son of man for his neighbour." By a trivial change of the vowel-points, the singular number may be admitted; and this is considered as an additional proof of Job's faith in a Redeemer. (Notes, xix. 23—27. xxxiii. 19—26.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

We are all very incompetent judges of our own performances, and often suppose that we have spoken things pertinent and excellent, when others deem them trite and inapplicable, and wonder that we should dwell on topics not worth hearing, or be emboldened to speak at all. In fact, while the speaker is partial, the hearer is often prejudiced; and both parties should watch over themselves, if they would amicably settle controversies, profitably conduct conversation, or even preach and hear the word of God in a becoming manner.—We are not suitably affected with the sufferings of others, because we "do not love our neighbour as ourselves." It is natural to those who are at ease, to give sage advice, grave reproofs, or solemn warnings, to the afflicted, and even to censure and condemn them; but we ought to consider how we should feel, if thus treated in similar circumstances. Indeed, the prosperous are commonly troublesome comforters of the afflicted; sympathy and tenderness of spirit are seldom learned, except in the school of tribulation; and the experienced believer, who can make allowances for the anguish of disease, and the force of temptation, and recollects what topics have proved consolatory to himself, best "knows how to speak a word in season to the weary," which may strengthen his faith and hope, and assuage his grief.—In great distress, when we can get no relief, we are apt to yield to repining; and as the believer may then be tempted even to think hardly of God's dealings with him, he may well be borne with, if he speak peevishly and harshly of his fellow-creatures.—The consideration of the variety of complicated miseries that a godly man may endure from the frown and correction of God, the rage and malice of Satan, and the ingratitude and cruelty men; in his conscience, reputation, connexions, soul and body; should teach us to prepare for trials, and excite our gratitude for our many mercies, while it should warn the sinner to flee from the wrath to come. How weary and desolate will the wicked be in the eternal world! How will the rage of Satan, the company of the damned, mutual enmity and contempt, and the irreconcilable wrath of God, unite with the reproaches of conscience, and the horrors of despair, to fill them with inexpressible misery! There they will be the mark of all the arrows of Divine vengeance, and employed in incessant weeping, wailing, and gnashing of teeth!—But should not the same reflection lead the believer to Gethsemane, and Golgotha? The divine Saviour had far more cause than Job to complain that "he was made weary;" that all his company of followers were desolated; that his enemy who hated him was permitted to assault and tear him; that he was delivered into the hands of the ungodly, who gaped upon him, gathered themselves against him, reproached, insulted, smote, and crucified him; yea, that "it pleased the Lord to bruise him," and inflict upon him agonies unknown; yet, "not for any injustice in his hands, also his prayer was pure." He was "wounded for our transgressions," and suffered for our sins, that he might deliver us from the wrath to come, and bestow on us the gift of eternal life. Should he not, then, be precious to our souls? and ought we not promptly to obey and to suffer for his sake?—If our conscience be sprinkled with his atoning blood, and testify to our integrity; if our witness be in heaven, and our record on high,

And when we go the way whence we shall not return, it will be a release from prison, and an entrance into unalloyed glory and felicity.

NOTES.

CHAP. XVII. V. 1, 2. The nature and violence of Job's disease, rendered it painful to him, and offensive to others, when he drew his breath; and he concluded that his days were expiring, and that the sepulchres of his ancestors were ready for him. In these doleful circumstances he was surrounded with professed friends, who were indeed mockers; as they insulted over his misery, and despised instead of comforting him; nor could he turn his attention from their reproaches to view more encouraging objects, or think of any thing else during whole nights. (Marg.)

V. 3—7. Again Job intreated the Lord to give him some assurance that he would soon try his cause, or appoint some impartial judge, to whom he could confidently refer the decision; (Notes, xvi. 17—22. xxiii. 3—7. xxxiii. 1—7;) for his friends, being judiciously infatuated, would never be honoured in such a service. He supposed that their former professions of affection for him were mere flattery; or that their doctrine flattered the prosperous, as if they were the favourites of Heaven; or he assured them, that though he desired fair treatment from them, he did not wish them to flatter him; being sensible that God abhorred flattery, and that they who aimed to advance themselves by it, would heap up disappointment and misery for their children.—"I must speak the truth of them, (though it displeases them,) and not soothe them in their errors; for he that flatters his friends, when he should prove them, may look long enough before either he, or his children, find one that will deal sincerely with them." (Bp. Patrick.)—Indeed, God had so reduced and afflicted his servant, that he was become a proverb and an object of derision, even to those who before professed greatly to respect and delight in him. (Notes, xxix. 18—25. xxx. 1—4. Ez. xxxiii. 30—33.)

V. 8, 9. Upright believers, in different parts and ages of the world, would hear how this conscientious servant of God had been afflicted, and how his friends had treated him, at which they would be greatly astonished. But this would excite them to distinguish themselves from hypocrites, and set themselves against them; especially against such as condemned others merely because they were afflicted. And when God should make known Job's real character, and the reason of his extraordinary trials; his example would be an adjudged case, that no adversity could prove a man to be wicked, or an object of Divine wrath. This would be a great encouragement to the righteous to hold on their way in the midst of difficulties, reproaches, and suspicions; nay, to grow stronger in faith under those very trials which detected and turned aside the hypocrite. Some explain the passage as a wish, "Let the upright," &c.; but, in fact, these have been the effects of Job's sufferings in numberless instances; and this was one grand design for which they were permitted. "Ye have heard of the patience of Job; and have seen the end of the Lord, that the Lord is pitiful and of tender mercy."—Here a glimpse of divine light, and a lively exercise of faith and hope, broke forth in the midst of the despondency of Job's discourse. (Notes, xix. 23—27. xxiii. 8—12.)

V. 10. Do you, &c. That is, "Re-examine my cause, and alter your unjust decision: for, I cannot find one among you who has spoken on the subject, as a wise man would have done." (Notes, vi. 27—30. Mal. iii. 13—18.)

V. 11, 12. An old translation seems here to be both most literal and intelligible; "My days are past, my enterprises are broken, and the thoughts of my heart have changed the night for the day, and the light that approached, for darkness."—All the purposes which Job had formed, however wise, pious, or benevolent, were, as he supposed, finally come to nothing, as his days were past. (Notes, Ps. cxlvi. 3. Ec. ix. 10.) And now the thoughts which possessed

CHAP. XVIII.

Bildad sharply reproves Job for presumption and impatience, 1—4. He enlarges on the miseries of the wicked, 5—21.

THEN answered "Bildad the Shuhite, and said, 2 How "long will it be ere ye make an end of words? "mark, and afterwards we will speak.

3 Wherefore "are we counted as beasts, and reputed vile in your sight?

his heart turned the night into day, by preventing his rest. Yet when the light approached, it was turned into darkness by the gloom of his disquieted mind.—"My thoughts will not let me sleep in the night, nor enjoy pleasure in the day." (Bp. Patrick.) (Notes, vii. 1—6. 13, 14.)

V. 13—16. Whenever Job thought of waiting, in hope of his sufferings being terminated, that thought was associated with the idea of lodging in the dark and silent grave. His disease, and his daily reflections, familiarized his mind to corruption and the worms: and he was induced to claim kindred with them, through the present loathsomeness of his disease, and to expect more relief from them, than from his friends and nearest relations.—He had indeed no hopes of temporal good; nor would they, who flattered him with these expectations, ever witness such a change in his circumstances. All his hopes would soon descend with him into the grave; when he and his friends also would rest together in the dust. (Notes, vi. 8—13. 20, 21. ix. 18—22.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

If we be constrained to dwell with mockers and revilers, we should endeavour to withdraw our attention from them, by meditating on the blessed society in heaven; that our tempers may not be ruffled by "abiding in their provocation."—Through our Divine Surety, the believer shall not only be justified from his sins against God, but from all the false accusations of man.—To be so judiciously blinded, that the Lord hides the heart from understanding, forms a most dreadful case, and forebodes everlasting shame and misery: but this never befalls those who humbly trust and serve him; nor should we rashly conclude it to be the case of any, merely because they mistake in some things, which appear to us of great importance.—The Lord abhors the flattering of the prosperous, and the contemning of the afflicted: we should therefore study godly simplicity, and candid compassion.—Vain is the praise of men; they extol a person one day, and insult him the next; they idolize and then execrate, perhaps without any other cause, than a change in a man's outward circumstances. Let us then be more indifferent about human applause; and "seek the honour which cometh from God."—As we, at this distance of time, may derive encouragement and instruction from the sufferings of Job, so may others from our lighter afflictions; and this may serve to reconcile us to them. Indeed, the upright believer will extract benefit from every event. The falls of those who once seemed to run well, will teach him humble watchfulness and jealous fear; and stir him up to notice and protest against hypocrites and hypocrisy: the afflictions of the godly will teach him the nature of his warfare, and warn him to prepare for the conflict: and the heaviest cross which is laid upon him, will eventually tend to strengthen his faith, increase his patience, and encourage his hope, while he is walking in the ways of God, and doing his work.—We should always be open to conviction, and ready to retract our erroneous sentiments and unmerited censures; for this is a good proof of wisdom.—The purposes and thoughts of our hearts are soon broken off, by sickness or the prospect of death: and they often break our sleep, and darken our days with solicitude to no purpose. Let us then learn to renounce carnal hopes and anxieties, to execute immediately every wise and useful design, and "to cast all our care upon him that careth for us." Let us remember, how nearly our bodies are allied to corruption, the worm, and the dust; and seek for that lively hope which shall be accomplished, when the hope of the wicked will be put out in darkness; that when our bodies are confined in the grave, our souls may enjoy "the rest reserved for the people of God."

NOTES.

CHAP. XVIII. V. 2—4. Bildad had before given Job good advice and encouragement; (Notes, viii. 4—7. 20—22;) but here he used nothing but rebukes and presages of approaching ruin. He speaks, as if Job had some associates who took his part, when he says, "How long will it be ere ye make an end of words?" (Note, xxxv. 4—8.) He thought it long, before his own time came to speak; and he calls upon Job, and all who were of his sentiments, 4 He <sup>teareth</sup> <sup>himself</sup> in his anger: <sup>shall</sup> the earth be forsaken for thee? and shall <sup>the</sup> rock be removed out of his place?

6 The light shall be dark in his tabernacle, and his <sup>candle</sup> shall be put out with him.

7 The <sup>steps</sup> of his strength shall be straitened, and <sup>his</sup> own counsel shall cast him down.

8 For <sup>he</sup> is cast into a net by his own feet, and he walketh upon a snare.

10 The <sup>snare</sup> is <sup>laid</sup> for him in the ground, and a trap for him in the way.

to mark with attention, that they might understand, what was spoken by him and his friends.—It must be allowed, that Job had spoken contemptuously enough concerning the discourses of his friends, declaring that "God had hid their hearts from understanding," and that "he could not find one wise man among them:" for he had been too much moved by their unjust suspicions and erroneous principles. Bildad, however, seems to have been much more angry; as if Job had counted him and his friends senseless as beasts.—And because he had said, that he "took his flesh in his teeth," (Note, xlii. 13, 14,) alluding to his exquisite pain, Bildad ascribed it to his furious anger, which prompted him to do himself a mischief: and as he would not allow himself to be a wicked man, Bildad concluded that he wished to alter the fixed laws of the Lord's righteous government, in order that he might be exempted from punishment.

V. 5-21. The remainder of this chapter is a rhetorical declamation on the miseries of the wicked. There is indeed a great deal of truth and animation in the description: but the application of it to Job was unjust and cruel. It does not contain a single proof of the doctrine maintained by him; namely, that the wicked are uniformly exposed to peculiar calamity in this world, or of the wickedness of Job. For the former, Bildad appealed to facts which by no means would bear him out; and the latter he thought undeniable from Job's remarkable calamities.—Yet if we include the state of retribution, as well as that of probation, we may deduce from it much useful instruction.—Job had said, that "his light was short because of darkness," (Note, xvii. 11, 12;) Yea, answered Bildad, it is always so with a notoriously wicked man. A glimmering of prosperity, and a spark of hope, may be given him: but both shall soon go out; and his family will share his misery. (Note, v. 3-5. viii. 4-7. 11-19. xv. 17-35.) His most vigorous efforts to escape destruction will be unavailing, and his craftiest projects will entangle him. He is like one who ventures on forbidden ground, where nets, and snares, and traps, are placed, which he cannot escape wherever he sets his feet: or like a man in a dangerous road, where robbers meet and plunder him. In short, he lives amidst alarms and terrors, and is always ready to flee as from an enemy: famine, penury, or other calamities, speedily befall him: afflictions, as it were, greedily devour him: diseases prey upon his strength and comeliness; and some one more dire than the rest, like "the first-born son of death," fastens upon him and cannot be removed. Thus all his confidences fail him: and death, as "the king of" all the "terrors" which have assailed him, stares him in the face, and affrights him with the near prospect of approaching misery. Nay, destruction takes up his abode in his tabernacles; divine judgments, like the fire and brimstone which destroyed Sodom, desolate his family, and leave neither root nor branch: his memory is either lost or disgraced: he is driven into darkness, and chased out of the world, as not fit to live, or willing to die; (Note, Prov. xiv. 32;) and he leaves no descendant, son or grandson behind him: so that all who witness his doom, are terrified; and all that hear of it will be astonished. Surely, concluded Bildad, this is the doom of those who are more wicked than other men.—No doubt, he meant this application for Job; as the whole description is full of evident references to his varied calamities, and his desponding complaints. (Marg. Ref.)—But how different was the event of his troubles, and the sentiments of posterity respecting him, from what Bildad supposed they would be!

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The eagerness and asperity, even of good men, when heated in controversy, are often very indecent. They are "slow to hear, swift to speak, and swift to wrath;" (Note, Jam. i. 19-21;) and ready to give, but unable to bear, none of his: <sup>brimstone</sup> shall be scattered upon his habitation.

CHAP. XIX.

Job complains of the persevering cruelty, with which his friends distressed him: and shows the greatness and variety of his sufferings, 1-20. He entreats their pity, 21, 22. He professes his faith in a divine Redeemer, and a future resurrection, 23-27. He warns his friends not to persecute him, 28, 29.

affronts: sometimes they are lead even to boast, and revile, yea, to misunderstand and misinterpret each other; to overlook all the wise and pious sentiments of their opponents; and to make the worst of every apparent error, or sally of passion. We all perceive the folly of such violence in others, and many are afterwards ashamed of it in themselves: but few are able to avoid it at the time. It is therefore generally our wisdom, especially if our spirits be eager, to shun controversy: and it is always our duty to watch and pray against pride; for if we duly considered how mean, guilty, polluted, and ignorant we really are, we should not be so much offended, even were we "counted as stupid as beasts," and reputed vile in the sight of all others.—Violent anger torments those who indulge it: and, however we may fret and repine, we might far more easily remove the rocks, than disannul the immovable purposes of God, or alter the measures of his wise and righteous government: so that our wisdom and duty consist in seeking grace from him to enable us to submit, and to deduce profit from all his appointments.—It is common for angry disputants to rank their opponents among the enemies of God; to draw perverse conclusions from important truths; and to confound their own opinions, which are often erroneous, with the unerring testimonies of Scripture.—In this world there is no exact external discrimination betwixt the righteous and the wicked. Yet even on earth, which is as the wicked man's heaven, he meets with continual anxiety, terror, and vexation; with pain and sickness; with bitter disappointments to his pride, avarice, or ambition: and with gallant affronts and injuries: he experiences stings of conscience, and the dread of the wrath of God: and death is to him emphatically "the king of terrors," which threatens to tear him from all he loves, and plunge him into all he fears. These things often extort the doleful groan: else he smothers it in his breast, conceals it with a smile, or drowns it in hypocritical mirth, and sensual indulgence. He is continually losing his comforts, or his relish for them: and he has no calm confidence in God, no joy in the Holy Ghost, no lively hope, no communion with a heavenly Father, to countervail the loss. Yet, he cleaves to the world, as his best, his all; and is chased out of it sorely against his will: whilst God seems to frown, and conscience forebodes, that he is about to be driven from light into eternal darkness and despair. Whether he believe it, or not, "Surely such will be the dwellings of the wicked; and this the place of him that knoweth not God." Thus "his light shall be put out, and the spark of his fire shall not shine." (Notes, Prov. iv. 18, 19. 2 Pet. ii. 15, 16.) Nor will it signify to him, whether his memory be honoured, and his family flourish; or whether the one be buried in oblivion or covered with infamy, whilst the other is clean rooted out.—But they who partake of the salvation which is in Christ Jesus, are happy in the midst of their tribulations: they have hope and comfort; peace of conscience, and a submissive will, are their privilege; death is no longer to them "the king of terrors;" nor will they be chased out of the world, or driven from light to darkness. Rather, death will remove them to the land of perfect knowledge, purity, and felicity: they "shall he had in everlasting remembrance," and they may depart hence with the hope, that their posterity also shall be blessed.—Bear up then, ye suffering believers: ye shall for a little time have sorrow, but your Beloved "will see you again, and your hearts shall rejoice, and your joy no man taketh from you." (Notes John xvi. 16-22.)

NOTES.

CHAP. XIX. V. 2-4. Bildad had begun both his answers to Job with, "How long?" (viii. 2. xviii. 2.) But Job thought that he had more occasion to complain of the incessant accusations of his friends, than they of his persevering self-defence. Their harsh words vexed his soul, and even broke him in

5 If indeed ye will magnify yourselves against me, and plead against me my reproach:

6 Know now that God hath overthrown me, and hath compassed me with his net.

7 Behold, I cry out of wrong, but I am not heard: I cry aloud, but there is no judgment.

8 He hath fenced up my way that I cannot pass, and he hath set darkness in my paths.

9 He hath stripped me of my glory, and taken the crown from my head.

10 He hath destroyed me on every side, and I am gone: and mine hope hath he removed like a tree.

11 He hath also kindled his wrath against me, and he counteth me unto him as one of his enemies.

12 His troops come together, and raise up their way against me, and encamp round about my tabernacle.

13 He hath put my brethren far from me, and mine acquaintance are verily estranged from me.

14 My kinsfolk have failed, and my familiar friends have forgotten me.

15 They that dwell in mine house, and my maids, count me for a stranger: I am an alien in their sight:

16 I called my servant, and he gave me no answer; I intreated him with my mouth.

17 My breath is strange to my wife, though I intreated for the children's sake of mine own body.

pieces, destroying all his courage and confidence. They had reproached him ten times; a definite for an indefinite number. (Marg Ref.) They ought to be ashamed thus to treat their friend as a stranger, or an enemy: if indeed he were mistaken, his error chiefly hurt himself: and if we were guilty, he must bear the punishment, nay, indeed, he was severely suffering for his sins, and was rather an object of compassion than of severity.

V. 5-22. In these verses Job most pathetically expostulated with his friends, about their unkindness. If they determined to magnify themselves against him, by assuming the authority of judges, they ought, at least, to consider how great his miseries were, that they might be aware what cause he had to complain, and how little reason there was to add to his suffering; and, that God himself was contending with him, and had overthrown him, and so entangled him in inextricable difficulties, that he could not escape. He was plundered of his substance, and as injuriously robbed of his good name; and he could not prevail to obtain a hearing of his cause, or any answer to his prayer. His path was obstructed by impassable difficulties, and covered with impenetrable darkness, so that he knew not where he was, or what to do. (Note, Lam. iii. 2-20.) He had been stripped of his honour and authority: his possessions, family, and every hope of temporal comfort, were destroyed, like a tree which is plucked up by the roots: and he had such an inward sense of God's indignation, that he was, in his own apprehensions, counted as one of his enemies. In short, the judgments of God, like hosts of invading enemies, were evidently come to besiege his tabernacle: and his friends, relations, and acquaintance, notwithstanding their attachment, and obligations, to him in his prosperity, were now estranged from him, and seemed scarcely to remember his name. His few remaining servants would neither obey his authority, regard his intreaties, nor afford him any assistance; but kept at a distance, as disgusted with his appearance, or as despising his abject condition. Nay, his wife, forgetful of conjugal affection and duty, would not come near him in his extremity; though he intreated her sympathy and assistance, for the sake of their children, the pledges of their former love, and the occasion of their present common sorrow! Even the children of his neighbours watched his words and actions, in order to deride him; and his inward friends, to whom he had entrusted his secret thoughts, and whom he had loved for their supposed piety, were become his enemies, and abhorred him. At the same time his disease had reduced him to a mere skeleton: nay, his very skin was consumed, so that nothing was reserved to him entire, but his gums and his teeth.—In this wretched case he pathetically implored the compassion of his friends: God had touched him in every tender part; they needed not add their persecuting reproaches to his awful judgments, as if vested with the Lord's prerogative, and acting by his authority; and they ought, surely, to be satisfied with his outward sufferings, without wounding his spirit, or bereaving him of his hope in God.

V. 23-27. The Spirit of God seems, at this time, to have powerfully operated on the mind of Job. The gloom and tempest of his soul were dispersed; and he afterwards discoursed with more serenity and resignation. At some times he had appeared ready to despair: but here he "witnessed a good confession," declared the soundness of his faith and the assurance of his hope, and seemed to emerge from his temptations, in the extremity of his afflictions; even as the expiring Jesus, when the depth of his inward sufferings was over, exclaimed, "It is finished," and "Father, into thy hands I commend my spirit." (Notes, vi. 8-13. ix. 14-21. x. 18-22. Matt. xxvi. 36-39. xxvii. 50.)—Job began, by solemnly wishing that what he was about to utter; (for of that he seems to speak, rather than of the protestations of his integrity; ) might be recorded in the most public and indelible manner, "in a book," or, with "an iron pen in lead, or upon a rock for ever;" according to the several methods then in use of registering remarkable transactions: and in this God granted, may exceeded his desires; for, being written in the sacred Scriptures, his words will continue to the end of time, and be made useful to multitudes in all ages and nations. "I know," says he, "that my Redeemer liveth." The word "Redeemer" signifies a kinsman, or near relation, to whom the redemption of captives, or of alienated estates, belonged by custom, before the giving of the law. (Notes, Lev. xxv. 25-28. Ruth iv. 1-8.) The promised seed of the woman, who was to bear the nature, and be the Redeemer, of man, was evidently intended. Job was assured, that this Redeemer of sinners, who ransoms and restores to them their forfeited inheritance, was his Redeemer; he was conscious that he embraced the promise of his coming, and expected salvation through him. He had no doubt but he was even at that time a living Redeemer: according to the words of Jesus, "Before Abraham was, I am." He believed also that "he would stand at the latter day upon the earth:" that in the fulness of time, he would appear as "the seed of the woman, to bruise the serpent's head," while his "own heel would be crushed:" that after his resurrection he would stand up as the first-fruits of them that sleep in the dust of the earth; and that at the last day, he would appear as the Judge of the world, to raise the dead, to destroy this earth, and to complete the redemption of his people.—As to Job himself, though after his skin, which was almost destroyed, his body would be consumed by putrefaction; yet he should see God in human flesh, (so some translate it; ) nay, he should be raised again from the dead, and behold his God and Saviour. Him he should certainly behold, "for himself," as his portion and felicity; not only as the object of mental contemplation, but with his own eyes, in his own body raised from the dead, and not in another. All this he firmly believed and assuredly hoped for, though at present his reins, or vitals, were consumed within him by disease, and he despaired of recovery in this world.—Other interpretations have been given of this extraordinary testimony; but none that will bear comparison with this most obvious explanation of the original.—An old translation of two verses is very literal, and worthy of notice: "For I am sure that my Redeemer liveth, and he shall stand at last upon the earth: and though after my skin, worms shall destroy this body; yet shall I see God in my flesh." The last clause may either refer to the Redeemer's incarnation, or to his own future resurrection, or to both.

V. 28, 29. After this confident declaration of his faith and hope, Job again warned his friends no longer to persecute him: as they had sufficient evidence, that the root of divine faith and grace was planted in his heart, whence all true godliness springs: or, that, on a careful examination, it would be found that the doctrine sprang from the root of truth; or, that this would appear to their confusion, at the coming of the Judge. So that it would be dangerous for them to treat him as a hypocrite, or an infidel: for God in anger might visit them with some terrible calamity; and teach them by painful experience, that there is a judgment appointed, when he will avenge his servants on their enemies.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

which he delighted in, concealed, spared, and would not forsake, but reserved as a sweet morsel to eat secretly, would create him such inward horror, such dreadful diseases, and such dire miseries, that it would be like the venom of the asp, or as if he had been bitten by the viper. He would be disappointed of all his expected pleasure and ease: and, along with his ill-gotten wealth, he would be deprived of all which he had laboured for, as a punishment of his injustice and oppression. He would have no comfort of his riches, while they remained; and he would be stripped of all, (as Job had been,) and have nothing for any one to covet. This would come upon him suddenly, in the height of his prosperity, by a combination of wicked men, as Job's had done. Nay, just when he would be ready to say, "Soul, take thine ease, eat, drink, and be merry;" God himself would pour the fury of his wrath upon him. (Notes, Num. xi. 31—34. Luke xii. 15—21.) There would be no escaping from the weapons of Divine indignation: his inward terrors would equal his outward calamities; so that every kind of misery would be laid up in store against him: he would be consumed as dried fuel, which burns of its own accord without being blown; for the judgments of God, without the intervention of men, would desolate his family. If his wickedness were before masked with hypocrisy, it should thus be brought to light. Persons of all descriptions would unite against him. All which he had possessed would be totally dissipated. For this was uniformly the portion of a wicked man from God, and his appointed heritage.—The reference in all this is manifest, not only to Job's calamities, but also to his complaints. His outward losses and inward anguish; the triumphs of his enemies, and the unkindness of his friends and relatives, are evidently hinted at. Says Zophar, 'This is the heritage of a wicked man; and therefore doubtless thou art one.' (Notes, 1—3. xviii. 5—21.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

They are frequently the most forward to dispute, who are most evidently in the wrong. We are pleased with our own thoughts, as with our own children, and fancy that others will equally admire them. Thus we are led to make indecent haste to speak, lest we should lose the credit and gratification of our pertinent observations; and lest others should lose the benefit of them. In this eagerness we consider each "check" as a reproach, and every effusion of passion is esteemed a demonstration. But others generally judge very differently: nay, we ourselves can seldom reflect afterwards on such warm debates, without shame and remorse. It is very difficult for men of warm passions entirely to repress this unbecoming propensity: but watchfulness and prayer will do great things, in a course of time; and we may profit by observing our own and others' errors, and by the rebukes and corrections of our heavenly Father.— We must not limit the dispensations of God by our rules; nor censure others out of fondness for our own notions. But though the wicked do often prosper even to the end of life: yet it is a decided matter amongst all wise men from the beginning hitherto, that "the triumphing of the wicked," and "the joy of the hypocrite" are transient and fleeting; and that they shall shortly perish disgracefully and for ever. In general, some kinds of wickedness ruin men's constitutions; and if they be not cut off before, entail pain and disease on their old age, which carries them down to the grave: the pleasures and gains of sin, like drinking sweet poison, or like the lulling venom of the asp, terminate in remorse, in anguish, and in ruin. A curse from God often corrodes the oppressor's abundance: he hath no enjoyment of it, and suffers none of those connected with him to have any ease or pleasure; and very often it is torn from him in an awful and sudden manner. "There is no peace, saith my

There the hypocrite shall be detected, and have his portion with the unbelievers: whilst heaven and earth shall arise up against him: for, "indignation and wrath, tribulation and anguish, are reserved for every soul of man, who" impenitently "doeth evil: but glory, honour, and peace to every one," who proveth himself a true believer, by working that which is good in the sight of the Lord. (Note, Rom. ii. 7—11.)

NOTES.

CHAP. XXI. V. 1—6. In this chapter Job discourses less on his own calamities, and more directly answers his opponents. He introduces his subject by intreating their attention, and desiring that they would neither interrupt him as Zophar had; nor disregard and misunderstand his words, as they all had hitherto done. This he would take, instead of those consolations, which he had vainly expected from them; and if, after a fair hearing, his discourse was found impertinent, and his reasonings inconclusive, he would consent that they should renew their mockery. Indeed, his complaint and appeal were directed to God, and not to them: otherwise his spirit might well be troubled, when sarcasms and reproaches were all which they afforded him, under his unprecedented sufferings. (Notes, vi. 1—7.) Yet, if they looked upon him they might see misery sufficient to demand compassion: and, as they knew no evil against him, their bold interpretations, of this mysterious providence, should be turned into silent astonishment. For every recollection of the dreadful change, which he had experienced, filled him with trembling and consternation.

V. 7—16. If the doctrine, maintained by Zophar, and Job's other opponents, was true, and Providence discriminated uniformly betwixt the righteous and the wicked; how was it, that so many wicked men lived, grew old, and continued in power and prosperity to death? Perhaps no instance had occurred of a truly pious person being so suddenly and dreadfully afflicted, as Job had been; and it was not possible for man to distinguish exactly between the true believer and the hypocrite. But it was undeniable, that numbers of notoriously profane and wicked men were advanced to wealth and authority, continued in prosperity to old age, and witnessed their posterity established in the most desirable settlements, before their death: that they were often more free from alarm and correction than others; that their cattle and substance rapidly increased; that their children whom they trained up in vanity, sensuality, and dissipation, multiplied, and were in health and peace around them; that they lived even to extreme old age, (for so the original word signifies,) in outward ease and indulgence, and died without any remarkable pain or distress. So that, if men were to judge merely by outward prosperity, the wicked might be pronounced the most happy, and even the favourites of Heaven. Yet they grew more impious and presumptuous, even by prosperity: they openly cast off all regard to God, and neither knew, nor desired to learn, any thing about his truths, ordinances, and precepts; they despised his favour, defied his vengeance, and counted his service and worship irksome and unprofitable. (Notes, ix. 22—24. xii. 6—10. xvi. 17—35. xx. 10—29. Ps. xvii. 13—15. lxxiii. 1—17. Jer. xli. 1—4. Mal. xli. 13—18.) Now, it must be allowed, that the Almighty, whom they despised and affronted, gave and continued to them these good things, and could take them away when he pleased; nor were they so in their own hand, that they could retain them for a moment. Job, for his part, was far from approving their counsel, or conduct, or desiring their prosperity : though his friends inferred, that he thought the wicked happy ; because he argued, that they often prospered, while the righteous were afflicted. (Note, Ec. ix. 1—3.)

V. 17—22. All these verses may be read interrogatively. “How often” does it happen, that the prosperity of wicked men is extinguished with sudden and awful judgments ? Sometimes indeed it is so, but more frequently, they live and die in outward ease and peace. “How often” doth God in his anger distribute to them uncommon calamities, rendering them as stubble, or chaff, before the tempestuous wind ? “How often” is it observed, that their iniquities are punished upon their children, while their eyes behold their destruction, and they know that they drink of the wrath of the Almighty, as a recompense for their crimes ?—It had been laid down as a general rule, that God almost uniformly visited wicked men with these and similar judgments : yet, in fact, instances in which they were clearly thus distinguished from others, but seldom occurred. And if they prospered till death ; whether they lived till old age, or died in the vigour of life, the subsequent condition of their families would not affect them, either with pleasure or pain. Indeed, who shall presume to teach the Judge, of the most exalted creatures, in what way he should administer his government ? Or who shall presume to explain, or decide on, any of his dispensations, as if inconsistent with his justice or wisdom ?

V. 23—26. Job, from his appeal to facts, justly inferred, that there was no exact discrimination observed in these dispensations. One haughty sinner comes peaceably to his end, having experienced a continual series of health, indulgence, and success ; like cattle that feed in rich pastures. Others, perhaps not so wicked, never know any thing but pain, sickness, poverty, and trouble, and die in anguish and distress. Thus both go down to the dust alike, and become food for the worms.—The words translated, “His breasts are full of milk,” are differently interpreted. The word rendered breasts is not elsewhere used in Scripture ; and some think it means milk-pails. But others, supposing it to coincide with the subsequent clause, thus translate the passage, “His ribs, (sides, or viscera, intestines,) are full of fat :” and indeed this seems the true sense of the words.

V. 27—30. Here Job brings the matter to an issue. He knew that his friends wrongfully condemned him, as one who had usurped, or abused, his authority, and who had been an unjust oppressive magistrate, and a hypocrite ; and that they considered his desolated habitation as the proof of his guilt. But any common traveller, to whom they might refer the case, could point out the flourishing habitations and splendid monuments of the ungodly, which they observed in their journeys : from these tokens they would conclude, that wicked men were not punished here, but were frequently exempted from the calamities which overtook others ; being reserved to the day of wrath and destruction in another world. (Notes, xxv. 5—14. xxiv. 1—20. xxix. 12—17. xxi. 35—40. Rom. ii. 4—6. 2 Pet. ii. 4—9.)

V. 31—33. Oppressors are often so powerful, that none dare call them to account, or reprove them : and at last they die in peace, are buried with magnificence, and sleep as quietly in the grave as others do. Indeed, death closes their prosperity : but none have been, or ever shall be, exempted from this common doom ; so that it is evident, there is no exact discrimination between the righteous and the wicked, in the outward dispensations of Providence. (Notes, Ec. iv. 1—3. v. 8. Hab. i. 2—4.)

V. 34. Job concluded with enquiring, why his friends comforted him in vain, with the hopes of returning worldly prosperity, in case he repented and sought unto the Lord ? For there was no truth in their system : nay, there was falsehood interwoven with all their answers, which rendered them inconclusive, and inapplicable to the subject.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—16. It is not easy to obtain an attentive hearing from eager disputants. Interruption and disregard are commonly reciprocal ; hence misapprehension, unfair conclusions, and unmerited contempt and reproach : and when men

But, this behaviour is peculiarly improper to the afflicted, who should at least have the consolation of being heard with patience and candour.—We might well yield to inward disquietude, if we had none to complain to in our distresses but man ; or, if the Lord were as severe against us, as our brethren sometimes are. But the true believer may speak to God at all times, and he will compassionately regard those complaints, and bear with those infirmities, which men disregard or condemn.—The afflictions of the faithful, compared with the prosperity of the wicked, have caused astonishment, and discouragement, to the servants of God in all ages. But we should adore the depths of those judgments which we cannot fathom : and the clear light of the gospel, with the discoveries of the eternal world, will explain the difficulty, and shew the wise designs of God in all these dispensations. Yet, under severe trials and temptations, the most established believer finds it as hard to apply his principles for immediate encouragement ; as the mariner in a furious storm does to manage the vessel by the rules of navigation.—It is undeniable, that wicked men often grow rich and great, establish flourishing families, escape alarms and corrections, succeed in their projects, train up their children in pleasure ; and, after a life of splendour and indulgence, go down to the grave in old age, without any remarkable calamity : yea, they are interred with magnificence, and many vain attempts are made to abate the horror of death, and the noisomeness of the grave. It is equally certain, that this has emboldened impiety and infidelity ; and led many to infer, that there is no God, or that he takes no notice of human affairs, and that religion and morality are needless or useless.—Prosperity adds strength to men's pride, and fuel to their lusts ; and thus they grow hardened in presumptuous wickedness.—Alas, what numbers do we see in this land, where the light of the gospel clearly shines, whose actions say unto God, “Depart from us !” Their open and constant violation of his law, and their contempt of his gospel ; their profanation of his day, and desertion of his ordinances ; their families left without the least appearance of religion ; their incessant course of riot and dissipation ; their inordinate pursuit of wealth or power ; their discourse, devoid of all reverence to the name, truths, or precepts of God, and full of levity and folly, if not of ribaldry and profaneness ; these things seem to “say unto God, Depart from us ; we desire not the knowledge of thy ways.” Such persons do not desire to think, hear, speak, or read about him : they treat religion, as if it were beneath their rank, fortune, spirit, or genius : they do not deem the Almighty on any account entitled to their obedience or gratitude ; and they suppose his service to be a mere drudgery, which can yield neither pleasure nor profit, and in neglecting which there can be no danger ! Yet “these prosper in the world, and have riches in possession.” And, though the Lord is sometimes “known by the judgments that he executes ;” yet they, or their families, are seldom visited by remarkable calamities. Indeed they, as well as others, must shortly die. But many of them outwardly enjoy more pleasure and suffer less pain, while they live and when they die, than their pious neighbours. And though the pomp of their funerals, and the panegyric of their flatterers, will afford them no real advantage, yet they fare as well as others : and whether their children prosper, or are afflicted, after their death, it adds nothing to their joy or sorrow. It is evident, that their good things are bestowed upon them by God : yet he distributes sorrows in his anger, and, however spared for a time, they are as stubble before the wind, and as chaff for the fire of his indignation. For, indeed, it avails little whether wicked men enjoy on earth all the delights of sense, without pain, sickness, or hardship ; or whether they live and die without enjoyment and in bitterness : as they are all “reserved to the day of wrath” and destruction, and the misery which is beyond the grave will swallow up all their former comfort. As they have said to God, “Depart from us, we desire not the knowledge of thy ways ;” they cannot reasonably expect any other, but that He, the fountain of felicity and Judge of the world, will at last say to them, “Depart from me, ye cursed, into everlasting fire, prepared for the devil and his angels.” (Note, Matt. xxv. 41—46. *Marg. CHAP. XXII.

B. C. 1520.

Eliphaz shews that man's goodness cannot profit God, 1-4. He accuses Job of various crimes, which he supposes, had brought on him his calamities, 5-14. He contrasts the doom of sinners visited by divine judgments, with the security of the righteous, 15-20. He exhorts Job to repent, and encourages him to hope for mercy, 21-30.

THEN Eliphaz the Temanite answered and said, 1 Can "a man be profitable unto God, *as he that is wise may be profitable unto himself?

3 Is it "any pleasure to the Almighty, that thou art righteous? or is it gain to him, that "thou makest thy ways perfect?

4 Will he "reprove thee 'for fear of thee? "will he enter with thee into judgment?

5 Is "not thy wickedness great? and 'thine iniquities infinite?

6 For "thou hast taken a pledge from thy brother for nought, and 'stripped the naked of their clothing.

7 Thou hast "not given water to the weary to drink, and thou hast withholden bread from the hungry.

8 But "as for the "mighty man, he had the earth; and the "honourable man dwelt in it.

9 Thou hast sent "widows away empty, and the "farms of the fatherless have been broken.

10 Therefore "snares are round about thee, and "sudden fear troubleth thee;

11 Or "darkness, that thou canst not see; and "abundance of waters cover thee.

12 Is "not God in the height of heaven? and, behold, the "height of "the stars, how high they are!

13 And thou sayest, "How "doth God know? can he judge through the dark cloud?

14 Thick "clouds are a covering to him, that he seeth not; and he walketh in the circuit of heaven.

15 Hast thou marked "the old way, which wicked men have trodden?

16 Which were "cut down out of time, "whose foundation was overflowed with a flood;

17 Which said unto God, "Depart from us: "and what can the Almighty do "for them?

18 Yet "he filled their houses with good things: but "the counsel of the wicked is far from me.

19 The "righteous see it, and are glad: and "the innocent laugh them to scorn.

20 Whereas "our "substance is not cut down, but "the remnant of them "the fire consumeth.

21 "Acquaint now thyself with "him, and "be at peace; thereby good shall come unto thee.

22 "Receive, I pray thee, the law from his mouth, and "lay up his words in thine heart.

23 If thou "return to the Almighty, thou shalt be "built up, "thou shalt put away iniquity far from thy tabernacles.

24 If thou "desist from thy sin, and "be just, thou shalt "build up thy tabernacle.

25 If thou "desist from thy sin, and "be just, thou shalt "build up thy tabernacle.

26 If thou "desist from thy sin, and "be just, thou shalt "build up thy tabernacle.

27 If thou "desist from thy sin, and "be just, thou shalt "build up thy tabernacle.

and impieties, which he had cloaked with the mask of hypocrisy.—He therefore directly charged him with depriving his poor brethren of their mean and scanty clothing, by taking it in pledge for debts which he unjustly claimed; and of withholding bread and water, or needful relief, from those who were perishing by want; of decreeing as a judge, in behalf of the rich and powerful, for their favour and bribes; and of sending away the widows and orphans robbed of their property, and bereaved of all power to recover their right. (Notes, xxiv. 2-12. xxix. 12-17. xxxi. 1-8. 13-23. Ex. xxii. 25-27. Neh. v. 1-7. Ez. xviii. 5-9. Am. ii. 5-8.) His unexpected calamities, with which he was surrounded and entangled, were the punishment of these oppressions: and it was no wonder that he complained of being involved in darkness, distracted with terrors, and overwhelmed with afflictions, like impetuous torrents, when he was guilty of such crimes.—Some think he meant that Job was blinded by his selfish prejudices, or judicially involved in mental darkness; or he would readily have perceived the reason of his calamities.—All parties were agreed that God displayed his presence and glory in heaven, and was infinitely exalted above all creatures: but Eliphaz charged Job with inferring from this, that God "could not know," or did not notice, the actions of men, which were concealed by the intervening clouds; or that, satisfied with the enjoyment of his own felicity, he disregarded the affairs of his creatures. So that, if Job were not a direct atheist, he implicitly denied the Divine perfections and providence: and therefore he feared no punishment for cloaking his injustice with the shew of piety, and vindicating his character, when visited by the just judgments of God. (Notes, Ps. x. 2-11. lxxiii. 11. xciv. 1-9. Ez. viii. 7-12. Zeph. i. 12.)

V. 15-20. Eliphaz here evidently adverted to the general deluge. The earth was then filled with violence; men had said unto God, Depart from us; and they enquired concerning Noah and his few associates, "What can the Almighty do for them?" (Notes, Gen. vi. 11, 12. 17.) But, though their houses were for a time filled, by a bountiful Providence, with good things, what way did they at length tread? They were cut down by an awful judgment, and the foundation of their confidence was overflowed and destroyed with the flood. (Notes, Gen. vii. 10-23. Matt. xxiv. 36-41.) This was well known; and therefore Eliphaz maintained that such judgments befall notorious sinners; and thought that he had the best reason to use Job's words, "The counsel of the wicked is far from me;" (xxi. 16.) And, as it was always matter of exultation and triumph to the righteous, when wicked oppressors were thus ruined; Job had no reason to wonder that they seemed to mock at his calamities and complaints, whom they considered to be such an one. "But," added he, "our substance," who are really godly men, "is not thus cut down;" while the vengeance of God, like fire, consumes every remnant of those who by their crimes are proper fuel for it. Perhaps he alluded to the destruction of Sodom. (Notes, Gen. xix. 24-29. Luke xvii. 32-37.)—Eliphaz's arguments and precedents by no means proved, that wicked men were always thus visited in this world. The Sabeans and Chaldeans did not act with greater injustice to Job, than he did, in this rash condemnation of him; and as he ascribed his own exemption, and that of his friends, to their piety, rather than to God's mercy, his discourse also savoured of pride and ingratitude.

V. 21-30. The former part of Eliphaz's answer must be condemned; but much of this conclusion merits great commendation: though it implied that Job had hitherto been a stranger to true religion, and that temporal prosperity would be the sure consequence of his sincere conversion. It contained, how-

V. 17-34. We are not competent to declare what God, the universal Judge, ought to do, or to comment on what he doeth: nor should we deem ourselves the objects of his love, or of his wrath, because of outward dispensations; or condemn any as sinners above other men, because visited with remarkable calamities: for in all conclusions, and arguments, of this kind, there is error, presumption, and self-sufficiency. The wicked man may suffer many dreadful calamities on earth, and must have many peculiar terrors and vexations: he wants that peace of conscience, that confidence in God, and that hope of heaven, which the believer enjoys: prosperity increases his guilt, and strengthens his distempered passions: he has all his good things here, and nothing to look for hereafter, but unmixed and eternal misery; and may expect to be banished from the presence of God hereafter: while the righteous hath all his evil here, and unmingled and eternal good in another world. (Note, Luke xvi. 24-26.) As, therefore, we are all speedily drawing towards the grave, must we not certainly conclude, that the most adverse lot of a true believer is infinitely preferable to the greatest prosperity of an unbeliever? Let us then put "far from us the counsel of the wicked:" let us seek the Lord, and desire the knowledge of his ways: let us count his service our liberty and pleasure; and the privilege of praying to him, our highest honour and richest charter. Let us look forward to the general judgment and the eternal world; and we shall see the prosperity of the wicked, and the trials of the righteous, perfectly consonant with the eternal wisdom, justice, truth, and goodness of God; and must cheerfully conclude, even when under his correcting rod, that they, and they only, are blessed, who trust and serve him. (Notes, Ps. lxxiii. 23-28.)

NOTES.

CHAP. XXII. V. 1-4. Eliphaz still supposed Job to maintain, that God favoured the wicked; and therefore he addressed him the third time. He intended in this introduction, to shew that God, in all his appointments, acted out of pure love to justice, and was not influenced by interested or selfish affections.—He has nothing to fear, or hope, from any of his creatures: none can profit or injure him: his essential glory and felicity receive no accession from their obedience, however perfect: he is not excited by the greatness of any one, to institute a legal process against him to bring him down; nor can any one make him his debtor. A wise man consults his own advantage, but he cannot profit God, by serving him. The Lord indeed approves and delights in holiness, because it is right in itself, and conducive to personal and social happiness; but not because he is any gainer by it. (Marg. Ref.) His justice therefore must be invariable and impartial: his rewards are the result of his love of good; and his punishments spring entirely from hatred of evil. (Notes, Ps. xvi. 2, 3. Luke xvii. 7-10.)—These are great truths, and were well understood by the disputants; though here rather incautiously stated: but Eliphaz and his associates, confounding this state of trial, with that of future retribution, misapplied them to the case of Job; as if the justice of God could not be vindicated unless he were proved to be a wicked man!

V. 5-14. In these verses Eliphaz brought as particular a charge against Job, as if he had had evidences ready to prove every tittle; yet he had no reason for his rash accusation, except that Job was visited as, he supposed, God always visited every wicked man, and none else! He demanded, whether Job could deny the greatness and immense number of his crimes? Indeed all have committed innumerable sins, in which there is an inconceivable degree of criminality: but Eliphaz did not mean such transgressions as were common to Job with other believers, or even with men in general; but flagrant iniquities was in such confusion, that he could get no fixed apprehension of his merciful presence, so as to obtain comfort and support by spreading his case before him; and he could perceive no tokens of the Lord's approach to deliver him, or to silence his accusers. His efforts were all fruitless, and his views gloomy. The powerful operations of God were discernible; but his gracious presence was hid in anger; and he seemed to stand at a distance, or to frown upon him. Yet Job was assured that the heart-searching God knew and approved his general conduct and character; and that when his integrity had been suitably tried, he should be brought forth purified as gold from the furnace. For he was conscious that he was an upright believer; that he had obeyed the commands of God, and followed the example of his justice and goodness; and that he had steadily kept that path, without declining, turning back, or growing weary. (Notes, 2 Sam. xxii. 21—28. 2 Cor. i. 12—14.) Nay, he had relished and delighted in, the truth and commandments of the Lord, more than in his necessary food; and would sooner have gone without his stated meals, than have deviated from his service. (Notes, Ps. xix. 7—11. cxix. 97—105. Jer. xv. 15—18.)—In these and similar protestations, it is evident that Job continually referred to the charges brought against him, and the advice given him, by his friends. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 13—17. At this time, Job seems to have felt that his vehement wishes and protestations were altogether vain, because he was aware that the purposes of God were irreversible, and his power irresistible: so that neither persuasion nor opposition could induce him to deviate from his settled plan. It was God's decree and fixed purpose thus to afflict him, though he knew not on what account; but there were many such deep mysteries in providence. (Notes, xxxiv. 20—30. Dan. iv. 34—37. Rom. xi. 33—36.) The presence of the Almighty therefore filled him with terror, and melted his heart with anguish: and he could not conceive, why he had not been cut off by death before these days of darkness; or why God would not cover him in the grave, from the view of such distresses: or, as some understand him, how it was, that his exquisite sufferings did not cut him off, and thus terminate his sorrow.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

They, and they alone, who have experienced the conflict between faith and unbelief, hope and despondency, the desire to submit, and the opposing power of self-will, during severe trials and sharp temptations, can clearly understand or account for the fluctuations observable in Job's language, and the state of his mind whence they arose; (Note, ix. 14—21 :) and the consideration, that so eminent a servant of God was harassed and perplexed, exactly as they are, cannot fail to afford them some relief. But our bitter complaints are very apt to savour of rebellion; and we should watch over ourselves in such circumstances, lest we provoke the Lord to increase his corrections. When we meet with unkind treatment or unjust censures, we should seek help and comfort from him: yet we ought to come in humble reverence, and wait his time with patience. Blessed be God, we may know where to find him: he is "in Christ, reconciling the world unto himself;" and upon a mercy-seat waiting to be gracious. Thither the sinner may go for salvation; and there the believer may order his cause, and fill his mouth with arguments, taken from the perfections, promises, covenant, and glory of God, whatever his special requests may be. Nor need we ever be at a loss for a conclusive argument, why he should pardon, teach, relieve, protect, comfort, and help us, if we trust his mercy and seek his glory. He will answer our enquiries by his word, and our prayers in his providence, and by his Spirit; and cause us to understand and approve his decisions. He will not crush or overawe us with his absolute power, but assist and encourage our supplications: and the only way to be delivered from our offended Judge, is to appeal to his mercy as our loving Saviour; for there is no condemnation for them who are approved true believers in Jesus Christ. (Note, Rom. viii. 1, 2).—Yet, even for them, there may be many temptations, sorrows, and perplexities: they may lose the sense of the favour of their God, and, for a season, seek it in every ordinance, and by every means, in vain. But he knoweth and approveth their path; he noticeth all their trials and difficulties; he will give them some distant intimation of a happy event; and when their uprightness is manifested, their graces increased, and their

CHAP. XXIV.

Job enquires why the judgments of God on the wicked are not evident to his people? 1. He shews that the most atrocious offenders often go unpunished in this life, and die as all other men, 2—24. He challenges any man to confute him, 25.

WHY, <sup>a</sup>seeing times are not hidden from the Almighty, do <sup>b</sup>they that know him <sup>c</sup>not see his days?

3 They 'drive away the ass of the fatherless, they take the widow's ox for a pledge.

4 They <sup>a</sup>turn the needy out of the way: the poor of the earth <sup>b</sup>hide themselves together.

dress consumed, they shall come forth as the purest and most precious gold. But the Christian, of whom we speak, is conscious of having uprightly embraced the salvation of God, and set out in his ways, by repentance, faith, and true conversion; he hath held his steps, and kept his path, without turning aside for the sake of worldly advantages, or for fear of the cross. Many false steps indeed he has made; but he has not been left to walk in the way of allowed sin; he obeys unreservedly, from love, and with the constancy of patient expectation. The word of God has been the food of his soul: he has an appetite for it; he relishes and digests it, converts it into nourishment, and is strengthened by it for service and for conflict. In his habitual judgment, he would rather want animal recreation, and starve with hunger, than be deprived of the spiritual sustenance of his soul: and therefore he takes pleasure in searching the Scripture, and in attending on the ordinances of God. (Notes, P. xlii. 1—3. lxiii. 1—6. lxxiv. 1, 2. Cant. i. 4.) Those, who answer this description, may be alarmed and troubled at afflictive events; they may be disquieted at the view of the unchangeable decrees, and irresistible sovereignty, of God; and be perplexed about the reasons of his appointments. They may even think that the Almighty delights to trouble them, and wish that they had died before their trials, but this is their weakness, temptation, and sin. For nothing can come upon them, but what is appointed by infinite wisdom and love: nothing, but in order to humble, soften, and sanctify them; nothing but what shall terminate in their benefit, and that of their brethren, and tend to the glory of God: and in their sober judgment they would be willing to endure darkness and distress for a time, for these important purposes. May we then learn to obey and trust the Lord, even under tribulation; be willing to die when he pleases, for we know not from what evils we may thus be exempted; and to live as long as he sees good, as we are not aware for what good purposes our lives may be prolonged!

NOTES.

CHAP. XXIV. V. 1. If God uniformly punished the wicked in this life, according to the opinion of Eliphaz and his friends; Job supposed, that wise and godly men, who are acquainted with him and his ways, would be able to give some account of the times of vengeance; to conclude how long the prosperity of the wicked would last; and to predict how long it would terminate, and what degree of misery proportioned to their crimes would be inflicted: as those, acquainted with the mind of the prince, and the laws of the land, can foresee and expect the sentence, which will shortly be pronounced and executed upon notorious malefactors. There are days appointed for their trial, and penalties annexed to their crimes, and we know what to expect, as to the murderer or traitor. Doubtless, the Governor of the world also hath his appointed times of vengeance; but, why are they not discovered to his people? Why are they not marked or evident? They certainly would be, if exact justice were awarded in this world: and as they are not, it is evident that the time of trial, and the days of executing vengeance, are not appointed in this life. (Note, Ec. ix. 1—3.)

V. 2—12. In the verses Job proves from facts, that notorious tyrants, oppressors, and robbers, frequently escape adequate punishment in this world. Unjust rulers often, under cover of law, deprive men of their estates, and take away their cattle and substance, as if forfeited; they oppress the orphans and widows, and drive the poor into concealment, or banishment. Many likewise disdain the yoke of obedience to God, or man, as the wild ass refuses to labour; and rapine and plunder are their daily employments. Thus troops of Ishmaelitic freebooters lived in the wilderness, by robbing the travellers; others reaped the corn, or gathered in the vintage, from the lands which they had violently seized; while the poor sufferers, whom they had ruined, were exposed, without clothing or shelter, to the inclemencies of the weather, and driven to make the rocks their refuge, and to live like wild beasts. Such cruel tyrants would pluck away the fatherless children from their weeping mothers, to be their slaves; and take either them, or any poor person, into bondage, as a pledge for some debt, contracted to keep their families from perishing. (Notes, xxii. 5—14. Neh. v. 1—13. Jam. v. 1—6.) They regarded not the hunger, thirst, or nakedness, even of those who laboured to support their luxury; but would take away the sheaf which the poor had gleaned, and suffer them to perish for hunger and thirst, amidst the abundance with which they were surrounded, and about which their labours had been employed. Men, thus wounded and crushed by oppression, publicly expressed their anguish in groans and lamentations: yet God inflicted no remarkable punishment upon the criminals, proportioned to their guilt, or equal to the miseries of the oppressed. Thus, in this life he did not expose and punish their folly, or impute folly unto them; as he certainly will do, when he shall "render to every man according to his works."—The words rendered "they take away the sheaf from the hungry," may be rendered, "They are hungry that carry the sheaf," or, Their reapers starve.

V. 13-17. Job here followed up his argument, by bringing instances of criminals who escaped detection and eluded justice; as those before-mentioned outraged it. Such persons "rebelled against the light," as if enemies to the sun; shunning all intercourse with it, as not being able to endure the discoveries which it would make. They therefore lay still all day: or only went out to mark their prey, and to make observations and form plans. Thus the murderer "rising with" or before, "the daybreak," lay in wait for the early traveller, to murder him; or he spent the night in robbery. The adulterer, or fornicator, waited for the dusk of the evening, and secretly having put a mask on his face, repaired to the haunts of his shameful practices. The house-breaker likewise concealed himself till all were asleep, and then forced his way into the habitations of honest men, to plunder them; even digging through the walls, which perhaps were made of clay. All these offenders hated daylight: they dreaded the approach of morning, before they had accomplished their crimes; and detection was as death to them. (Notes, John iii. 19-21. Eph. v. 8-14. 1 Thes. v. 1-11.) Thus they often, through life, escaped the punishment due to their crimes.

V. 18-20. These atrocious offenders, and many others, rushed swiftly and silently, "like the gliding stream," into every iniquity; they acquired a portion on earth by such accursed practices, without bestowing pains to cultivate the land: spending their time in deserts, and being seldom seen in the way towards the vineyards, which were frequented by those who laboured in them.—Some understand the passage, as a description of pirates who, sailing over the waters in light and swift vessels, grew rich by plunder, and despised, as mean and vile, the drudgery of cultivating the earth, and the profit acquired by it.—Yet, as dry weather and heat evaporate the waters, arising from the melted snows, or they sink into the earth imperceptibly and unnoticed; so numbers of these criminals went down unobserved into the grave. They were not ignominiously suspended on gibbets, to be devoured by the fowls of the air; but were buried, and became a delicious morsel for the worms. And, as no remarkable misery, or disgrace, attended their lives or deaths, even their mothers and nearest relations were soon comforted for them, and they were forgotten, as if no more criminal than other men: so that their wickedness came to an end, as a tree that grows undisturbed, and is not cut down, but decays and is broken through length of time.

V. 21-25. According to the observation which Job had made on human affairs, many escaped in this world, who had injured the childless and the widow.—The first clause may be rendered, "He feedeth the barren, that she should not bear:" and some interpret it of the methods which profligate men use of destroying infants in the womb, to prevent detection, or for other vile purposes. But it may signify, the oppression of the poor, called devouring them, by which marriage is discouraged, and the increase of the human species prevented.—Others, having become powerful by iniquity, were able to prevail even against the mighty; so that none could stand before them, or be secure even as to their lives, when they arose to plunder or murder: or they formed connexions with other powerful tyrants, for the purpose of oppression. Indeed, men often purchased their favour and protection; and, confiding in their promises, thought themselves safe: but these oppressors allowed them only a transient respite; and watched for every pretence or opportunity to injure them. Thus they had their season of exaltation, and then (as all must die) they were gone, and brought low, and removed in an advanced age, and with as much ease as other men.—Job, having stated these undeniable facts, challenged his friends, or any other persons, to prove them false or inapplicable; or to refute his doctrine, that calamities are no proof of wickedness.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1-12. The Lord knows the proper times for delivering his people, and for executing vengeance on his enemies; and he orders every thing in perfect wisdom, justice, goodness, and truth. Yet to the wisest and best of men, the conduct of his providence appears involved in perplexity: but the approaching day of judgment will throw full light on all his ways and works. In the prospect of that solemn season, we should neither be stumbled nor distressed at witnessing the prosperity of the wicked; nor discouraged if we share the troubles of the righteous.—The history of all ages and nations proclaims the desperate wickedness of the human heart. So far from loving their neighbour as themselves, men, if not powerfully restrained, are induced by selfishness and idolatrous love of worldly objects, not only to withhold from others the comforts of life, but to deprive them, by fraud or violence, even of what is necessary, and to reduce them to abject misery. When this selfish and destructive principle has surmounted the fear of human justice, or climbed into the throne, iniquity is committed with a high hand, or prescribed by law. At other times it operates by rapine or fraud; and in all cases it dictates manifold violations of justice, truth, and mercy to man, as well as a disregard of the duties which we owe to God. But who can express the crimes that have been committed, or the miseries which have been occasioned, by this inordinate self-love. Men, more savage than tigers, have in all ages and countries been disposed to prey on the helpless part of their own species; and to plunder, oppress, enslave, or murder them, as best suited their purposes, or as they were able to conceal or to defend what they had done: or, by their brutal lusts, to reduce individuals and families, perhaps to still deeper and more exquisite misery. And though the groans of the poor, the naked, and the perishing, of the fatherless, the widow, the defrauded labourer; of those who are enslaved, dragged, or driven from their native shores, and cruelly tormented by human avarice, ambition, malice, and sensuality, do not seem to interrupt the indulgence of their haughty licentious oppressors; yet their cries enter into "the ears of the Lord of hosts," who is their patron; and who will at length shew before the whole world, that it is most dangerous to injure those, who are least able to defend themselves. But, "because sentence against an evil work is not executed speedily; the heart of the sons of men is fully set in them to do evil." God doth not immediately impute folly to them; and therefore they proceed, and encourage one another; and the earth continues full of violence and misery in multiplied forms.

V. 13-25. The workers of iniquity, however distinguished, universally "rebel against the light." If they did no violence to their own conscience, and to the common reason of mankind, there would be no need for them to bestow so much pains to conceal or palliate their crimes. But after all the efforts of infidels and profligates, their practices continue shameful, and court darkness; they hate the light of day, as well as the word of God, even when not exposed to the sword of the magistrate: and their fear of detection is an earnest of future conviction and punishment.—The murderer, the adulterer, and the robber, (characters associated in Scripture,) may enjoy their accursed portion, escape punishment from man, and live long, and go down quietly into the grave; and they may be ready to conclude, that "no harm shall happen to them." But "after death is the judgment:" and then they shall find that, all the while they abused the patience of God, and hardened themselves in impenitency, they "were treasuring up wrath against the day of wrath, and revelation of the righteous judgment of God, who shall render to every man according to his works." "Then will they return, and discern between the righteous and the wicked; between him that serveth God, and him that serveth him not." (Notes, Mal. iii. 13—18. Rom. ii. 4—6.) And where is he, who can disprove these doctrines, or deny that they are of infinite importance? Let us then be thankful, if we have been kept from such atrocious crimes; let us be as assiduous in seeking the salvation of our souls, and in doing good, as sinners are in doing evil; remembering the apostle's admonition, "Ye have need of patience; that, having done the will of God, ye may receive the promise."

NOTES.

CHAP. XXV. V. 1—6. The appeal to undeniable facts, which Job had made, seems to have reduced his opponents to great difficulties. They were not convinced of their error: but they could not answer his arguments. Bildad, therefore, spoke but few words in reply; Zophar did not answer the third time; and Eliphaz declined leading on another attack. Bildad, however, thought that Job had spoken without a proper reverence of God, or a due sense of his own vileness. He reminded him, therefore, that the sovereign authority over all creatures belonged solely to the Lord; and that all ought to reverence his Majesty, and to fear his omnipotent displeasure. All the inhabitants of heaven, in perfect unity and harmony, obeyed him: his innumerable creatures, marshalled in exact order, were observant of his commands and entirely under his control: and, as the light of his sun pervaded all the earth, so, all that partook of his goodness, ought to submit to his authority. But, if the heavenly bodies were obscure when compared with his infinite glory, and in his view of them, how could sinful man abide the severity of his judgment, or be approved holy in his sight? Perhaps intimating that his very birth, amidst the sorrows and pains of his mother, proved him born in sin, and a fallen creature. And, as he was so mean a worm, and so vile at his best estate, he surely ought not to contend with God, or exalt himself above him.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

It is better for Christians to avoid controversy, or to put an end to it, when they do not speedily come to an agreement; and to converse on such subjects, as all allow to be true and important.—The pious, however distinguished, agree, that the wicked may flourish for a time, but shall be rooted out at the last; they should therefore be careful not to quarrel with each other, not to envy the wicked, and not to faint in tribulation.—If we were duly influenced by the reverential fear of God, we should submit to his sovereignty, do his will, seek his glory, and rejoice in his favour, in peace and harmony, and without murmuring and disputing; even as the angels in heaven do. Indeed, his innumerable armies, yea, all his creatures, except fallen angels and men, are, in their several ways, subject to his command. All things living partake of his bounty: ought we not then to bear deserved correction patiently, and use his gifts to his glory? And ought we not to imitate his kindness to "the unthankful and the evil?"—It is very important, that we should be convinced that we are mean, guilty, and polluted creatures before him; and the most important question, though often least attended to, which can possibly be asked, is this, "How shall man be just before God? Or how shall he be pure, who is born of a woman?" (Notes, ix. 1—3. xv. 14—16. xix. 1—6.) But the most atrocious sinners, when humbled before God, and disposed to accept of his salvation, may be "justified by faith," and made holy by divine grace, and be exalted to glory in heaven; where the sun and moon will no longer shine, but "the Lord himself will be our everlasting light."—(Notes, Rev. xxi. 22.)

NOTES.

CHAP. XXVI. V. 1—4. Bildad had brought no argument tending to refute Job's doctrine: and therefore Job ironically admired the assistance which Bildad had given to his friends in their extremity, and the instruction which he had afforded him in his perplexity. His friends had expected much help from him to their drooping cause; he had hoped for some important counsel in his difficulties; and all had supposed that he would abundantly clear up the controversy, and fully show how the matter really stood. But indeed he had spoken so little, and that little was so foreign to the business, that they were no stronger, nor he any wiser; and all parties were just where they had been. Surely, Bildad could not mean to utter words to him, as if he needed such counsel! Surely, he did not suppose his words to be the dictates of the Spirit of prophecy, or even the language of faith and grace, when it was evident that he spake in his own spirit! Some expositors, indeed, give another turn to the passage, and suppose that Job meant to deride Bildad's speech; as if he thought the almighty and infinitely wise God needed such an advocate and counsellor! It is evident, however, that Job spoke with peevishness and self-preference; but it is surprising, that such a sufferer should have spirits for banter and ridicule.—Plentifully, &c. (3.) Or, "Hast abundantly made known wisdom?"

V. 5—13. To show Bildad that he did not want his instructions, Job began more particularly to discourse on the works of God. The word translated "dead things," may be rendered giants, or monsters. Enormous creatures are produced under the waters, among the numberless inhabitants of the deep, by the mighty power of God. Or, "The dead, even the most mighty, tremble before him; the waters," &c. Neither the bodies, which all over the earth are laid in the grave, nor the state of the departed souls of men, are concealed from his all-seeing eye; and even the place of punishment allotted to the wicked is under his inspection: the heavens are stretched out by him over the vast expanse of this northern hemisphere; and the earth is so wonderfully suspended in the pure space, that it needs no support. (It seems this was known to some persons at this early period.) Immense quantities of water are treasured up in the atmosphere; and are so confined in the clouds, as not to rush down impetuously, but gradually, as it is necessary for watering the earth. The throne of God in the heavens is hid by interposing clouds, being too dazzling for us frail mortals to behold: he confineth the raging ocean within its appointed bounds; nor will it ever break forth to cover the earth, while day and night endure. The mountains, (which appear as "the pillars of heaven," or the heavens themselves, are astonished, and tremble, when the Lord speaketh in his wrath. He powerfully raises such storms in the ocean, as divide it into ridges of mountains; and he knoweth how to abase the proudest and stoutest of his enemies.—Some think that the dividing of the Red Sea, and the destruction of Egypt, or Rahab, (so the word is,) are here alluded to; but as there is no other reference to those events, as this is ambiguous, and as probably Job lived before that time, it perhaps refers to the general operations of the power of God.—Finally, by his creating Spirit, he hath adorned the heavens with glorious luminaries; and replenished the worlds above with holy angels: and every formidable monster on the earth, and in the waters, as dreadful serpents, crocodiles, and whales, are his workmanship, and under his control. Yea, the devil, who is subtle and poisonous, and of whom the serpent is the constant emblem, was originally the creature of God, and is yet absolutely under his power. (Notes, Gen. iii. 1. Is. xxvii. 1. Rev. xii. 7—12.)

V. 13-23. Job may be thought in these verses, to have come over to the opinion of his opponents: but in fact he conceded all which he could, to obviate misconception, and to establish his own conclusions. He allowed that wicked tyrants and oppressors were often visited with sore judgments, on themselves or their families, so that these might be called "their portion from God;" yet not so constantly and uniformly, as to be a rule of judgment for deciding on men's characters; this he had undeniably disproved, and it was all that he contended against. He allowed that their numerous and prosperous families were often strangely impoverished and destroyed, while none were left to bury them, or weep over them; or they were hurried to the grave, and forgotten because abhorred. That they often laboured to get estates, which eventually came into the possession of better men, who did much good with them: (Notes, Esth. viii. 1, 2. Prov. xiii. 22. xxviii. 8:) that the establishment of their families, which they had diligently promoted, was destroyed; as a moth is shaken out of a garment, or removed as a tent, which was fixed for a temporary shelter to those, who guarded the vineyards or gardens: and if they escaped such calamities, they soon lay down in death; and of all their riches, had not so much as the vain distinction, of being gathered to their fathers by an honourable funeral: or they were not gathered among the righteous; but opened their eyes in hell, far from all their treasures and employments. The expectation of this doom overwhelmed them with terrors as an inundation, and unexpected calamities swept them away, as men are plundered or murdered in the night. In short, the wrath of God, like a furious tempest, hurled them out of their places on earth, and cast misery upon them, and did not spare: while they found it impossible to escape his dreaded and deserved vengeance; and those, whom they had oppressed, rejoiced at their death, and detested their memory.—The chief difference between this passage, and the discourses of Job's friends on the same subject, is this: they spoke of the misery of wicked men before and at their death, as uniformly proportioned to their crimes; Job intimated that it might be so; but if not, the consequence of their death would assuredly be dreadful.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

We may safely make our appeal to God, when we are conscious of integrity before him, and are fairly called to it: but we are so apt to mix corrupt passions with our best services, to mistake delays for denials, and corrections for vexations, and to speak irreverently or impatiently when afflicted; that, without continual applications of the blood of sprinkling, we cannot possibly have any well-grounded confidence before God.—As we ought not, without scriptural evidence, to conclude that we are in the way of salvation, or deceitfully profess to serve God; so, we should not be induced to condemn ourselves as hypocrites, if conscious that we trust in his mercy, and aim to do his will; nor should we justify those who censoriously condemn their brethren. A good conscience on evangelical principles, and a watchful opposition to sin, will prevent our own hearts from reproaching us, and inspire confidence in God, in the midst of afflictions and calumnies, and in the hour of death: “and this we should hold fast as long as we live.”—No greater misery can be imprecated, than the doom of the most prosperous sinner; no more dreadful case imagined, than that of the successful, specious hypocrite.—He may indeed call on God, when frightened or distressed; but he will soon desist in weariness or despondency, and seek some other relief. But the humble penitent will knock at mercy's door till it is opened, and not be induced by any delay to depart without a blessing. and he who delights in God, will always call upon him, in adversity and prosperity, in life and death.—If we would teach others, we must depend on the help of the Almighty, and not conceal his truth: and if we would convince the erroneous, we must guard against misconstructions, and carefully shew, in how many things we are agreed. In this, at least, all good men are of one judgment: that the wicked may be, and often are, grievously afflicted upon earth with outward calamities; that they must be subject to inward terrors and vexations; and that, even if they prosper till death, and die in outward peace, they will then be driven from riches, pleasures, and honourable stations, into eternal poverty, misery, and contempt, by the wrath of God, like a furious storm hurling them into destruction. In vain will they seek to flee out of his hand, while “he shall cast upon them, and not spare,” the punishments justly due to their crimes. “What then, is a man profited, if he gain the whole world, and lose his own soul? And what shall a man give in exchange for his soul?”

NOTES.

CHAP. XXVIII. V. 1—11. Job had maintained, that the dispensations of Providence were not regulated upon such principles as his friends contended for; but by a higher and incomprehensible wisdom: and to illustrate and confirm this, he here shewed, that the sagacity of men was chiefly competent for natural things, and employed in them: it could not therefore be supposed they were acquainted with the deep counsels of God. The all-wise Creator has treasured up the metals in the earth; but man's necessity, or avarice, prompts him to search for them. There he finds the ores of gold, silver, iron, and brass, mixed with other substances, and resembling stones; and he discovers ways of separating and refining them by fire. With their lamps, the miners, “put an end to the darkness” of the subterraneous caverns, and search out all the valuable treasures contained in them; even those stones of darkness, which are situated in such perilous and unwholesome places, as may be called “the shadow of death.” Here “floods break out upon the inhabitants” of these dreary regions; being those waters, which had sunk into the earth, from the foot of man, and formed subterraneous springs and streams; and the miners are forced, with great labour and danger, to make new channels, that the waters may run away from them. As by the labour of man, corn and other things suited for his food grow upon the surface of the earth: so, precious stones, sparkling like fire; or inflammable substances, as brimstone or coals, are dug out of it. Among the stones of the earth are sapphires, as well as the ore of gold. In pursuit of these treasures men travel under-ground, by a road which is unknown to the swiftest and most quick-sighted animals. By their persevering labour and contrivance, they undermine and overturn rocks and mountains; and they cut rivers and form banks under ground; while they seek out, and bring forth every hidden valuable treasure there repositied.—This book is, beyond all reasonable doubt, one of the most ancient in the world; yet the art of mining and refining metals, and the use of precious stones, are spoken of as things well known in the East, where Job and his friends dwelt. But very many ages after, populous nations have been found, which were little acquainted with these things: the iron especially, (which is in fact the most useful of all metals,) seems to have been little known or employed among the Greeks, in the very early ages of that nation; and it was totally unknown in America, when that continent was first discovered. So that, the most ancient times appear to have been far more civilized, and acquainted with things useful, than subsequent ages: and barbarous ignorance seems to have prevailed gradually; as the knowledge possessed by the antediluvians, and doubtless communicated by Noah and his sons, was forgotten among their posterity. The Bible by no means favours the general notion, that the first ages of the world were the most rude and savage, nay, indeed, is totally inconsistent with it.

V. 12—19. Job here maintained, that “wisdom,” (or the knowledge of God, and his works and ways, which led to a prudent and holy practice, and might enable men to unravel the mysteries of providence,) was far more difficult to be found, than the subterraneous treasures before spoken of. Indeed, men in general neither knew where it might be obtained, nor its inestimable value. It was not to be met with among men on earth, except as it came down from above. (Notes, Prov. ii. 1—7. Jam. i. 5—8. 16—18. iii. 13—18.) It could not be discovered, either by digging into the bowels of the earth, or diving into the bottom of the sea, or sailing to all parts of the world. By these means, indeed, gold, silver, and all kinds of precious stones, might be procured; but none of them, nor all of them together, could purchase wisdom.—Several different words are used in the original for gold; which are supposed to denote, either the place from which it came, the manner in which it had been purified, or the form in which it was offered to sale, whether wrought or unwrought. The words also, rendered “crystal,” “onyx,” “sapphire,” &c. are differently interpreted.

V. 20—22. As no wealth could purchase wisdom, so no creature could discover it. It was hid from the eyes of all living. Men of the greatest talents, who soared above the rest of mankind, as the fowls of the air above other creatures, could not, by all their speculations and discoveries, acquire wisdom. “Destruction and death,” indeed, brought some report of it: and if men deeply thought on these solemn subjects, they might understand something of the reasons, for which the wicked were permitted to prosper; and the event would at length clear up difficulties, and effectually shew what was man's wisdom. But previous and more particular instruction was necessary to make men truly wise.—The grave is the only place where we may learn something 21 Seeing it is hid from the eyes of all living, and kept close from the fowls of the air.

 22 Destruction and death say, We have heard the fame thereof with our ears.
 23 God understandeth the way thereof, and he knoweth the place thereof.
 24 For he looketh to the ends of the earth, and seeth under the whole heaven;
 25 To make the weight for the winds; and he weigheth the waters by measure.
 26 When he made a decree for the rain, and a way for the lightning of the thunder:
 27 Then did he see it, and declare it; he prepared it, yea, and searched it out.
 28 And unto man he said, Behold, the fear of the Lord, that is wisdom; and to depart from evil is understanding.

 4 As I was in the days of my youth, when the secret of God was upon my tabernacle;
 5 When the Almighty was yet with me, when my children were about me;
 6 When I washed my steps with butter, and the rock poured me out rivers of oil;
 7 When I went out to the gate through the city, when I prepared my seat in the street;
 8 The young men saw me, and hid themselves: and the aged arose, and stood up:
 9 The princes refrained talking, and laid their hand on their mouth:
 10 The nobles held their peace, and their tongue cleaved to the roof of their mouth.
 11 When the ear heard me, then it blessed me; and when the eye saw me, it gave witness to me:

of it. (Bp. Patrick.)—Surely nothing can be learned in the grave; and hell rather than the grave must be meant by the original word Abaddon. (Note, Rev. ix. 12.)

V. 23-28. All the preceding observations and enquiries, were evidently intended as introductory to these closing instructions; in which Job shewed, that God alone was the source and giver of wisdom. He knew where it was laid up, and the way in which it might be found. He managed the whole creation in perfect wisdom; determining the force and direction of every wind, and the quantity of water to be formed into rains and dews; regulating the course of the clouds, and directing the thunder and lightning. At the creation, he had his whole plan before him, and declared unto man, as much as was good for him to know: and he had prepared the whole of his intended operations, as accurately, as if they had been searched out by intense study.—This implied, that as men could not either alter, or comprehend, these works of God; they were equally unable to discover the methods of his providence. God had from the beginning plainly declared to man, that his wisdom consisted not in the knowledge of the secrets of nature, or of the Divine government, but in "fearing the Lord, and departing from evil." (Notes, Gen. xxii. 10-12. Deut. xxix. 29. Ec. xii. 11-14.)—Thus Job intimated to the disputants, that they might shew their wisdom much more, by a conscientious performance of their own duty, than by presumptuously intruding into the secret reasons of the Divine dispensations; or rashly condemning their afflicted friend as a hypocrite.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The riches of this world are sought with unwearied labour and extreme danger: the faculties of the soul and the vigour of the body are alike devoted to the pursuit; and, from age to age, men sacrifice their ease, ruin their health, and venture their lives for them! Indeed, they are good in themselves, and for the uses to which they were appointed: and the bountiful kindness of the Creator appears, in covering the surface, and storing the bowels of the earth with so many useful productions: nor should the ingenuity or industry which men employ about them be condemned, except as disproportionate. (Note, Gen. i. 20-25.) Neither silver nor gold, but the love of them, "is the root of all evil;" and the avarice, pride, and luxury of the human heart, not the creatures which God hath made for our use, ought to bear the whole blame of the mischiefs, to which they merely give occasion. It is also observable, that whilst God gives us all these things, he gives them in the way of industry; the productions of nature cannot be prepared for use, without venturing and enduring hardship for them; and, in like manner, whilst wisdom and grace are freely bestowed, we must labour and deny ourselves, if we would appropriate them. But did we understand the infinite value of these gifts, and our perishing want of them, we should think every hardship and sacrifice comparatively small. All earthly treasures are insufficient and precarious; they cannot give either peace of conscience, or health, or contentment; they cannot prolong life, or abate the fear of death, or purchase exemption from future punishment; they must be left soon, and for ever, and an account must be given of them to God. But true wisdom and grace confer peace, and joy, and lively hope; they deprive death of his sting, and ensure an eternal inheritance. Who then can estimate their value? All the treasures of the world, and the whole world itself, are worthless in the comparison: yet, alas! every gilded bauble is preferred to them! No labour is deemed too great to employ about carnal things; yet every exertion is too much about our spiritual and eternal interests! "Go then to the miner, thou sluggard, consider his ways, and be wise;" and imitate his ingenuity, application, and intrepidity, in the affairs of thy soul; seek salvation, as he does the gold and silver ore, and thou shalt be enriched for ever. But where is this wisdom to be found? In the heart of the earth? In the depth of the sea? Or, in the schools of the learned? It is "the Lord that giveth wisdom." The treasures of it are hid in Christ, revealed by the word of truth, and received by faith, through the operation of the Holy Spirit. There the Lord hath prepared and declared it; there we may search for it, and discover it. But it does not consist, in explaining all mysteries, settling all controversies, or solving all difficulties in the phenomena of nature, or in the Divine government. It is not intended to feed our pride and vanity, to amuse our curiosity, or to embolden our presumption; but to teach us where we are, and what we are, whither we are going, and what we want, and where our wants may be supplied. It instructs and encourages us sinners to "fear the Lord, and to depart from evil," in the exercise of continual repentance and faith; and it admonishes us to wait for that world, to which death will soon convey us, for fuller light respecting all the ways and works of God. Our business here is to believe, adore, love, and obey; not to comprehend and dispute. We receive the benefit of the rain, and avail ourselves of the winds and tides, and seek shelter from the storm; whether we understand the theory of them or not. Thus let us flee from the wrath to come, take refuge in the hope of the gospel, and receive the comforts of life thankfully, and bear its burdens cheerfully, without being desirous of knowing those "secret things which belong to the Lord our God." The government of the world is his, and he neither needs nor asks our advice; but, "to man he saith, The fear of the Lord, that is wisdom, and to depart from evil is understanding."

NOTES.

CHAP. XXIX. V. 1-6. It is probable, that when Job had finished his commendation of wisdom, he paused, to hear whether his friends had anything to add; but as they were silent, he proceeded to contrast his former prosperity, and his honourable conduct as a magistrate, with his present abject misery; in order to excite their compassion, and to excuse his complaints; and, perhaps, to engage their more fixed attention to the other parts of his discourse. Indeed, he could not but ardently desire that matters were so with him at the present as formerly. Then God preserved his health, his property, his family, his honour, and his peace, having "made a hedge about him." Providence smiled upon him, and he enjoyed spiritual consolations; so that he lived happily, and walked securely, in this dark and wretched world. Thus he had been favoured early in life; the secret wisdom of God had been communicated to him, and his secret blessing had rested upon him, and prospered his habitation; his soul had been refreshed with the secret pleasures of communion with God, before whom he had walked as his almighty friend; whilst his children shared and doubled his enjoyments. His cattle, fed in rich pastures, afforded such plenty of milk, and butter, that he could, had he pleased, have washed his steps in it: and his olive-yards, planted upon the rocky grounds, yielded such abundance, that it was as rivers of oil.—But he intimated that God had now withdrawn his protection, and the light of his consolations; excluded him from communion with him; and bereaved him of his wealth and children.

V. 7-11. Job next expatiated on the honour which had been rendered him. He had acquired great authority, and was become chief ruler over the neighbouring tribes; probably through his reputation for wisdom and justice, as well as on account of his affluence. So that when he went through the city to the gate, where his throne for administering justice was prepared, the young men stood so much in awe of him, and so feared his reprehension for their irregularities, that they kept out of the way; the aged rose, in respect of his character; and the nobles and princes were silent, as if bereft of speech, that they might attend to, and be instructed by, his arguments and decisions; and, indeed, all who saw and heard him, applauded his impartial justice, and bare testimony to his wisdom and discretion.

V. 12-17. 'Because Job's adversaries did so much charge him with wickedness, he is compelled to render an account of his life.' As no one attempted to disprove his attestations, no doubt he spoke what was undeniably true.—He could confidently protest, that it was his constant object to redress the grievances of the orphans and destitute, who demanded justice against their powerful oppressors; so that widows and other persons, who were about to be crushed, murdered, or starved, thanked him, and prayed for him, as their patron, with joyful hearts. He never appeared in public, but with an evident determination and the fatherless, and him that had none to help him.

13 The blessing of him that was ready to perish came upon me; and I caused the widow's heart to sing for joy.

14 I put on righteousness, and it clothed me; my judgment was as a robe and a diadem.

15 I was eyes to the blind, and feet was I to the lame.

16 I was a father to the poor, and the cause which I knew not I searched out.

17 And I brake the jaws of the wicked, and plucked the spoil out of his teeth.

18 Then I said, I shall die in my nest, and I shall multiply my days as the sand.

19 My root was spread out by the waters, and the dew lay all night upon my branch.

20 My glory was fresh in me, and my bow was renewed in my hand.

21 Unto me men gave ear, and waited and kept silence at my counsel.

22 After my words they spake not again; and my speech dropped upon them.

23 And they waited for me as for the rain; and they opened their mouth wide as for the latter rain.

24 If I laughed on them, they believed it not; and the light of my countenance they cast not down.

25 I chose out their way, and sat chief, and dwelt as a king in the army, as one that comforteth the mourners.

26 Yea, whereto might the strength of their hands profit me, in whom old age was perished?

27 For want and famine they were solitary; fleeing into the wilderness in former time desolate and waste.

28 I was as a father to the poor, and the cause which I knew not I searched out.

29 And I brake the jaws of the wicked, and plucked the spoil out of his teeth.

30 Then I said, I shall die in my nest, and I shall multiply my days as the sand.

31 My root was spread out by the waters, and the dew lay all night upon my branch.

37 I chose out their way, and sat chief, and dwelt as a king in the army, as one that comforteth the mourners.

38 Yea, whereto might the strength of their hands profit me, in whom old age was perished?

39 For want and famine they were solitary; fleeing into the wilderness in former time desolate and waste.

40 I was as a father to the poor, and the cause which I knew not I searched out.

41 And I brake the jaws of the wicked, and plucked the spoil out of his teeth.

42 Then I said, I shall die in my nest, and I shall multiply my days as the sand.

43 My root was spread out by the waters, and the dew lay all night upon my branch.

44 My glory was fresh in me, and my bow was renewed in my hand.

46 After my words they spake not again; and my speech dropped upon them.

doing good: if he value the blessing of the needy and afflicted, and the testimony of men's consciences to his equity and humanity, as his robe, his diadem, and his recompense; if he continue a stranger to fear, favour, and affection, to covetousness and self-indulgence, and resolutely act as the patron of the poor, the widow, the orphan, and the oppressed; desiring that their hearts may rejoice, and that their prayers for their benefactor may be united with many thanksgivings unto God: if by the use of his wealth, authority, and wisdom, he be as "eyes to the blind, and feet to the lame;" a father to the poor, and a terror and restraint to wealthy oppressors, and spare no labour for the effecting these valuable purposes. Such persons are public blessings; their protection is courted, and their friendship valued, by all good men; though their excellency be hated, and the power dreaded, by the tyrants, whose jaws they break, and whom they spoil of their prey. They prevent much mischief, make many wretched mourners joyful, and are an ornament to religion. And they have the peculiar honour to resemble Him, who hath "put on righteousness as a robe, and is clad with zeal as a cloak;" who rescues poor sinners from the power of Satan, and breaks the jaws of that devourer; who, in a far nobler sense, "is eyes to the blind, and feet to the lame, and a father to the poor;" whose words are all in wisdom, truth, and love, and his favour more refreshing than the latter rain; whose smile is so great a blessing to the desponding soul that waited for it, that he can hardly believe his own experience, when the Saviour manifests his love; and he will adore and reverence him the more for his unspeakable condescension.—How many, who were ready to perish, are now blessing him! How many mourners hath he comforted! But who can show forth all his praises? May we trust his mercy, and copy his equity, truth, and love!—Let us not, however, flatter ourselves with the expectation of continued honour and prosperity in this world. In the midst of all, we should think of dying soon; and even before death, of being deprived of all our outward comforts; though there should be every appearance that life and prosperity will be continued to us. Storms will succeed to calms, and calms to storms, in this changeable world; but in heaven will be uninterrupted and unchangeable felicity. Let us then look to our Captain and King: he hath chosen out our way, and hath been chief in sorrows, as well as in honours: and, as he comforteth his mourning followers, so he hath shown the whole army of his saints the way to victory and glory, through tribulation, sufferings, and death; and hath said, "If any man will come after me, let him deny himself, and take up his cross, and follow me;" and "Where I am, there shall my servant be."

NOTES.

CHAP. XXX. V. 1—14. Here Job most pathetically contrasts his present condition with his former honour and authority. Now the youths, who before had hid themselves lest they should be punished for their crimes, (Note, xxix. 7—11.) treated him with the greatest contempt; nay, the children of the most abject persons imaginable insulted him, whom he described as the vilest outcasts of society. These objects were so destitute of fidelity and honesty, so lazy and ignorant, that they were not capable of doing so much good as the dogs of his flock; and he would have disdained to have employed them in the meanest services about his cattle. Their lives, wasted in wickedness, had left them debilitated and ignorant, debauched and infamous in old age; and being burdens and nuisances by their crimes, they were expelled from society in a most miserable manner. Incapable of obtaining an honest livelihood, and afraid of being punished for their past offences, they had fled into the most desolate parts of the wilderness, and there miserably subsisted upon roots and herbs not fitted to sustain the life of man. For they were driven away as thieves, and concealed themselves in dens and caves from the search of pursuers; or among the weeds and bushes, where they grew savage like the wild asses. Such worthless wretches, of whom Job's active magistracy had rid the country, returned with their families when he was reduced; and, though their ignorant and profligate parents had neglected to give them any good instructions, yet they had learned to make songs and jests about Job, and to show their contempt and abhorrence, by affecting to shun him as a loathsome object, or drawing near him to spit in his face. (Marg. Ref. 10.) It may be supposed to do justice: the equity of his conduct was to him the robe, or the badge of his authority, and he deemed it more his honour, than any royal diadem. By counselling the ignorant how to manage their affairs, he became as "eyes to the blind;" by supporting the helpless with his power and authority, he was as "feet to the lame;" he was the general guardian and father to all poor people; and neither spared pains and expense, nor feared opposition, in searching out their causes, and rescuing them from oppression: so that he deprived rich oppressors of their power to do mischief, as effectually as a wild beast is disabled when its "jaw-grinders are broken;" and he constrained them to make restitution, as when "the prey is plucked out of their mouths." (Notes, Ps. lxxii. 3, 4. Prov. xxxi. 8, 9.)

V. 18—25. Thus respected, useful, and conscientious, and considering all as coming from the favour of God, Job had hoped to live long in prosperity, and to die in peace and honour in a good old age; for he seemed like a tree which had struck deep root in a well-watered soil, and was refreshed every night by the kindly dew. Heaven and earth seemed to favour him continually. He had done nothing to impair, or to prevent the increase of, his reputation or influence. His counsel was silently attended to, and his decisions were waited for with great expectation, and were refreshing as the seasonable rain. His smile was counted a very great favour: and if he relaxed from his usual gravity, and showed himself more affable with the people, they did not abate in their respect, or undervalue his kindness. Still they allowed him to counsel and command in all their affairs, as a king, with uncontrolled authority, rules over his troops: yet, amidst all, he never lost sight of the beneficent employment of comforting the mourners. (Marg. Ref.)—Some read all the latter verses in the present tense. "My roots are, &c.," as, Job's recollection of his inward thoughts, during his prosperous days, when anticipating the continuance of them, in which he had been so grievously disappointed.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The Lord protects and prospers us as he pleases, and he confers on those who love him, whatever can be beneficial to them. Yet riches and flourishing families, though a "candle of the Lord," may be soon and finally extinguished: they do but little towards illuminating our way through this dark world, and nothing towards cheering the vale of death. But when the mind is enlightened by the Holy Spirit; when a man walks in the light of God's comforting presence, and enjoys the secret pleasure of communion with him, every outward comfort is doubled, every trouble is diminished, and he may pass cheerfully, by this light, through life and death to heaven. The sensible comfort, however, of this happy state, is often withdrawn from those who have enjoyed it; and they regret the months and days which they have formerly known, and long for their return. In general, this change arises from negligence and "grieving the Holy Spirit;" but sometimes it may be an honorary trial of a man's faith and grace. Yet it is always right in such cases to examine ourselves, to enquire into the cause by fervent prayer, and to redouble diligence and watchfulness.—Many, however, who profess that they have walked in this heavenly light, complain that now it is not with them as in months past, and rest satisfied with unavailing lamentations! Depending on past experience, and concluding their state safe, they put up at present with worldly comforts, and are as negligent as they are joyless. And others, who have really walked with God, finding their comforts decline, are tempted to think all past experience a delusion, and to conclude that the Almighty hath finally forsaken them. But for those comforts, which are indeed from God, the true believer can find no substitute in the whole creation; and, though they may be withdrawn, they shall never be extinguished, but shall be restored, and endure, till lost in the blaze of heavenly glory.—Years, rank, and authority, if connected with eminent justice, wisdom, and piety, confer peculiar dignity and influence; they overawe the careless and lawless; they command the respect of inferiors and equals; and procure a deference even from superiors. When a man's judgment and integrity have thus obtained him an established reputation, his opinions are readily approved, and his measures adopted. Then it is peculiarly happy for him and others, if he is preserved humble, zealous for the honour of God, and ambitious only of sities, but regarded their reasonable desires ; and had not left the poor widow to behold, with unavailing wishes, the abundance of which she might not partake. He had shared his provision with the fatherless and the destitute ; for he had been educated to such maxims and habits ; and, from his earliest youth, he had been accustomed to bring up poor orphans ; and to counsel, protect, and provide for the widows. He had made clothes of his wool, for those who were destitute of proper covering, that, being made comfortable by him, they might pray for him. And if he had ever used his authority and influence to defraud the helpless orphan, he would consent that God should manifest his iniquity, by causing his arm to wither, and drop off from his shoulder-blade. But, indeed, he feared a more dreadful destruction from God in another world ; and, as the mightiest princes could not endure before his holy majesty, this fear alone was sufficient to restrain him from such iniquities.—As the most of Job's servants had been killed, and the rest were disobedient to him ; and as his cattle had been taken away from him ; so, it was a comfort to him to reflect that he had behaved well to the one, and made a good use of the other, whilst he had them ; and especially, that he had acted in these respects, not from regard to man, but from the fear of God, and reverence to his authority.—In what other ancient book, not written by an Israelite, shall we meet with such kind sentiments, concerning the lower orders in society ?

V. 24—28. Job had been very rich, (Note, i. 3 ; ) but he was conscious that he had neither gloried, rejoiced, or confided in his wealth ; nor thought himself, on that account, wiser, better, or happier man. But, considering himself as a steward, in respect of his possessions, and expecting to account for them, he had shunned this common idolatry ; and he had also entirely kept himself from all gross idolatry, open or secret ; he had never, in the smallest instance, given that honour to the sun or moon, those splendid and useful creatures, which belonged to the Creator alone. (Marg. Ref. Note, Deut. iv. 19.) For he knew that this was a denial of the unity, sovereignty, and exclusive right to adoration, of the God above. The words rendered "an iniquity to be punished by the judge," have led some to think that this book was written after the giving of the Mosaic law ; but the circumstance of no idolatry, except that of the sun and moon, being mentioned, is a much more probable argument in favour of a higher antiquity. The judicial law for punishing idolatry by the magistrate, seems to have been intended for Israel alone, as under the Sinai-covenant. The plural of the same word is used, and rendered judges, when the punishment of adulterers is spoken of ; (11.) Adultery is a crime which tends to destroy the peace of society, and, as such, falls directly under the cognizance of magistrates ; but idolatry is committed immediately against God ; and, if our translation be just, He, as the Judge of the world, seems meant, and not the civil magistrate. But indeed, the passage is rendered by the old translators, perhaps more properly, "an iniquity to be condemned."

V. 29—32. So far from hating his enemies, or revenging himself on them, Job declared that as he valued the favour of God above, he had not allowed himself to rejoice or triumph when mischief befell them, or to wish them any harm. (Notes, Ex. xxiii. 4, 5. Prov. xxiv. 17, 18. xxv. 21, 22. Matt. v. 43—48.) Nay, when his dependents were so enraged at those who injured him, that they were ready to devour them, he would by no means permit them to follow the impulse of their vindictive rage. (Notes, 1 Sam. xxiv. 4—7. xxvi. 8—12.) At the same time, in imitation of faithful Abraham, he was ever ready to entertain strangers and travellers, as circumstances required. Bishop Hall thus paraphrases the thirty-first verse :—"If the people of my house were not so taken up with the offices of my hospitality to others, that they had no leisure to feed themselves, and therefore complained for the want of that flesh, which they dressed for others." The words may be rendered, "Who will give us of his flesh ? we shall not be satisfied."

39 If I have eaten the 'fruits thereof without money, or have 'caused the owners thereof 'to lose their life ;

40 'Let thistles grow instead of wheat, and 'cockle instead of barley. 'The words of Job are ended.

V. 33, 34. So far from being a hypocrite, Job was conscious that he had not, after the example of Adam, or "the manner of man," attempted to conceal or justify his faults ; (Notes, Gen. iii. 7—11. Hos. vi. 7 ; ) but he was ever open to conviction, and ready to confess his offence to God or man, as there was occasion ; not fearing reproach or contempt on that account ; 'Whereby it is evident that he justified himself before men, and not before God.' Nor was he ever induced, by the fear of the multitude, or the contempt of the great families around, to neglect any part of his duty as a magistrate.

V. 35—37. After this particular protestation of his integrity, Job renewed his appeal to God, desiring that he would hear and decide his cause. "Behold, my object," (the scope and aim of all my discourse,) "is, that the Almighty would answer me." Job challenged his adversary, or accuser, to produce a libel, or written indictment against him ; he was confident that it would prove no disgrace, but an honour, to him ; as every article would be disproved, and the reverse be manifested. He was ready to go through his whole life, step by step, even assisting his accuser in drawing up the charge, and prepared in every particular to justify himself from the crimes alleged against him : and he would appear in court with the confidence of a prince who came to be crowned, not with the dejection of a criminal who dreaded condemnation.—Upon the whole, this protestation and appeal were well grounded, and honourable to Job's character. St. Paul in different places makes similar appeals ; but in a more modest and reverential manner. (Notes, 1 Cor. iv. 2—5. ix. 15—27. x. 29—33. 2 Cor. i. 12—14. vi. 3—10. vii. 2—4. xi. 7—12. xii. 11—16. Phil. iii. 12—19. 1 Thes. ii. 1—12.)

V. 38—40. As Job was about to conclude, another particular seems to have occurred to him, concerning which he had not exculpated himself. He had never seized upon lands, by putting the owner to death as a criminal, and confiscating his estate ; or by any other oppression or fraud. Nor had he reaped his harvest, without duly paying his labourers their wages. If he had, let God avenge it, by rendering the whole accursed, producing nothing but useless noxious weeds. (Notes, Gen. iii. 17, 18. iv. 10—12. Jam. v. 1—6.)—With this Job concluded, as with an air of triumph and confidence.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—12. "The grace of God, which bringeth salvation," hath in all ages, "taught men to deny ungodliness and worldly lusts, and to live soberly, righteously, and godly in this present world." Repentance and faith produce hatred of sin, and love to God and man ; and our interest in redeeming love is evidenced by a course of conscientious obedience. In general, however, it is best to let our actions speak for us ; and though, in some cases, we owe to ourselves, and to the cause of God, a solemn protestation of innocence, as to those crimes of which we are falsely accused ; yet, this is seldom made without some real or apparent ostentation.—Every wickedness is first conceived in the heart, where ten thousand enormities are devised which are never perpetrated ; being prevented by fear of man, regard to character, or want of opportunity and ability. The eye, the ear, and all the senses, are the common inlets of those evil thoughts which excite inward concupiscence ; we must therefore keep a strict guard upon them, and upon the imagination also, if we would keep out of the way of temptation and transgression. While we pray to the Lord "to turn away our eyes from beholding vanity," we should be careful to have all our senses and faculties occupied about lawful things : and, lest secrecy, or the hope of impunity, entice us ; we should habitually recollect that "the Lord sees our ways, and counts all our steps."—Without strict honesty and fidelity in all our dealings, we can have no good evidence of true godliness. Yet, how many who profess to believe the gospel of Christ, are unable to bear this touchstone ! Most men haste to deceive ; they covet riches, "their heart walketh

CHAP. XXXII.

Job's three friends being silenced, Elihu speaks, and is angry both with Job and them, 1-5. He excuses his interference, though young; because great and aged men are not always wise, 6-10. He complains, that the reasonings of the disputants were not suited to produce conviction, 11-15. He shows that he is earnestly desirous of speaking; and declares that he will be impartial, 16-22.

SO these three men ceased <sup>to</sup> answer Job, because he was <sup>righteous in</sup> his own eyes.

3 Also against his three friends was his wrath kindled, <sup>because</sup> they had found no answer, <sup>and yet</sup> had condemned Job.

4 Now Elihu had <sup>waited</sup> till Job had spoken, because they were <sup>elder</sup> than he.

5 When Elihu saw that <sup>there was</sup> no answer in the mouth of <sup>these</sup> three men, then <sup>his</sup> wrath was kindled.

6 And Elihu the son of Barachel the Buzite answered and said, <sup>I am</sup> young, and <sup>ye are</sup> very old; wherefore I was afraid, and <sup>durst</sup> not shew you mine opinion.

7 I said, <sup>Days</sup> should speak, and multitude of years should teach wisdom.

after their eyes," and they turn aside; manifest blots defile their hands; God sees, and man often detects, their dishonesty; and it is well if the ruin of their substance prevent the ruin of their souls.—Alas! that adultery also should be so common among professed Christians! It is, indeed, highly desirable that the authority of the magistrate should stop the spread of this fire, which destroys domestic peace, and every principle of purity, honesty, truth, and conscience; and which often provokes retaliation, till whole nations are filled with wickedness. But, if men suffer the criminals to escape, the Judge of the world will surely call them to a severe account: and this is sufficient to put all that fear him on their guard, lest their hearts should at any time be deceived.

V. 13-40. Genuine religion uniformly teaches us to treat inferiors and domestics with humanity, equity, and affection; to bear with their faults, to sympathize in their troubles, to hearken to their complaints, and to seek their present and future welfare; remembering that they are our brethren, as near to the great Creator, and as capable of eternal salvation, as ourselves. It disposes us, likewise, to kindness, as well as justice, towards the poor; to consult their inclinations, to share our comforts with them, whether we have abundance, or only a moderate provision; and to seek an interest in the grateful prayers of the fatherless and the widow, by sparing from our own indulgence, to feed, clothe, educate, or protect them. How contrary then must it be to Christianity, for men to enslave, oppress, and plunder the poor, because they "see their help in the gate," and have the law of the land, and the countenance of the ruler, on their side! A worse punishment, than the falling off of the arm from the shoulder-blade, awaits such oppressors, especially when they bear and disgrace the Christian name; even "destruction from the Lord, before whose highness they cannot endure." These crimes spring from covetousness, which makes gold a man's confidence, hope, and joy; as if his life consisted in the abundance of his possessions. But divine grace destroys this idolatry, by teaching us to seek our whole happiness from God; to subordinate all other affections to the love of him; and to receive and use all worldly possessions as his stewards, and to his glory. Yet, it is to be feared, that but few prosperous Christians can properly appeal to a heart-searching God, that they have not rejoiced, because their gains were great. Through the determination to be rich, numbers fall into temptations which ruin their souls, or pierce them through with many sorrows. (Note, 1 Tim. vi. 6-10.) This is the idolatry, to which we are most tempted; but it is a great favour to be preserved from all the false and fashionable kinds of religion, which from age to age supplant "the truth as it is in Jesus," and its sanctifying effects, and eventually prove a denial of God above.—The Holy Spirit always hath taught his children to do good against evil; to bless, and not to curse, their enemies; to repress revenge; to forgive as they hope to be forgiven; to avoid all rejoicing in calamities; and to restrain others from revenge and cruelty.—In respect of all these things, and in every particular, we should examine with prayer, how far we are followers of this ancient believer: whether we "use hospitality without grudging," and are ready for every good work? whether the fear of reproach or resentment, from the great or the many, do not induce us to neglect our known duty? whether we possess any ill-gotten property to cry out against us? or whether we deprive the labourer of his wages? If our conscience testify for us in these and similar enquiries, we should give God the praise, but we may have confidence now before his mercy-seat; and may hope to stand with humble boldness, as justified believers before his judgment-seat: we need fear no adversary, or accusation, or scrutiny; for "who is he that condemneth? it is God that justifieth;" and the slanders of our enemies will then be our crown: as princes we shall go near unto him, and enter into his glory, and sit down with him on his throne. But let us all judge ourselves, and not cover our sins as Adam; and where we are guilty, let us seek forgiveness; intreating "the Lord to have mercy upon us, and to write all his laws in our hearts," by the influence of his Holy Spirit.

10 Therefore I said, <sup>Hearken</sup> to me; I also will shew mine opinion.

12 Yea, I attended unto you, and, <sup>behold</sup>, <sup>there</sup> was none of you that convinced Job, <sup>or</sup> that answered his words;

14 Now he hath not <sup>directed</sup> his words against me: neither will I answer him with your speeches.

16 When I had waited, (<sup>for</sup> they spake not, but stood still, <sup>and</sup> answered no more;)

17 I said, <sup>I</sup> will answer also my part, I also will shew mine opinion.

18 For I am full of <sup>matter</sup>, <sup>the</sup> spirit <sup>within</sup> me constraineth me.

NOTES.

CHAP. XXXII. V. 1. Job's opponents were at length silenced, though not convinced. They could not answer his arguments, but they retained their unfavourable opinion of him; and they declined all further dispute, because he was "righteous in his own eyes," and determined, as they thought, at any rate to vindicate himself.

V. 2-5. It is evident, that others besides the disputants were present during this controversy, and Elihu among the rest. His name signifies My God is he. He was the son of Barachel the Buzite, of the kindred of Ram, which some suppose to have been the original name of Abraham, to whom Buz was nearly related; though others think that Aram, the son of Kemuel, is meant. (Gen. xxii. 21.)—Many singular opinions have been formed concerning Elihu: yet it is evident, that he was a young man of singular modesty and wisdom; but nothing more. He came nearer the true state of the case, than any other of the contending parties: but he evidently bore too hard on Job, and, in some instances, put harsh constructions on his words. (Note, xxxiv. 5-9.) He, however, charged him with no crime, except his misconduct in the management of the argument: and in this respect he was justly displeased both with him and with his friends. He alleged with truth, that Job had been more anxious to vindicate his own character, than to clear up the justice and goodness of God in afflicting him; and that his friends had persisted in condemning him, as a hypocrite, though unable to refute his doctrine, or to answer his arguments. But, as he was younger than they, he had modestly waited till the controversy was dropped, before he attempted to declare his opinion.

V. 6-14. Young men are commonly most forward to dispute, and aged men best qualified to be moderators; but here the case was reversed. Elihu allowed it to be a good general rule, that they who had the advantage of long experience should speak first, and teach wisdom to the young. But he observed, that there was <sup>a</sup> rational soul in man, and God gave wisdom, both natural and spiritual, as he pleased; so that facts proved that the greatest and most aged were not always the wisest. This reflection therefore at length emboldened him to state his opinion. He had carefully listened to the arguments of the disputants, as long as they could find any thing to say: but he perceived, that they could neither convict Job of iniquity, nor refute his doctrine. Indeed Elihu thought that they were left to be thus foiled, lest they should glory in their own wisdom, and improperly exult over Job, as proved to be a wicked man, by the testimony of God in his dealings with him. Or, as some explain the words, they reluctantly yielded that they were overcome, by counting it their wisdom to be silent, and by leaving it to God to confute Job by continuing his afflictions. But as Job had not spoken against Elihu, he purposed to answer him in a different manner; and, without attempting to prove him a hypocrite, he would reprove some things in which he was evidently culpable.

V. 15-17. These verses favour the opinion, that Elihu was the writer of this book: for he seems here to address himself, as an historian to the reader rather than as a speaker to that company. (Preface.)—He observed, that the disputants had been amazed to hear Job so confidently protest his own integrity, and perplexed to reconcile his situation with the Divine justice and goodness, unless he were a wicked man. They had given up the argument, as if deprived of speech; and they seemed to look for some one else to throw light upon the subject. So that he had full liberty to speak his sentiments; having patiently waited for this opening. (Note, 1 Cor. xiv. 26-33.)

V. 18-22. Elihu's mind was full of thoughts, in consequence of his having for a long time silently reflected on the subject, and he was inwardly constrained to speak. With much uneasiness he had refrained himself: his mind was agitated by his own meditations, in the manner that fermenting wine is ready to burst the bottle when it cannot have vent; so that it would be a relief, or enlargement, to him to speak, though it should not profit them. (Notes, Jer. vi. 10-12. xx. 7-9. Ez. iii. 12-15.) He intended to be impartial, and not to flatter either party, though they were his seniors and superiors; but he would 19 Behold, my belly is as wine which hath no vent; it is ready to burst like new bottles.

20 I will speak, that I may be refreshed; I will open my lips, and answer.

21 Let me not, I pray you, accept any man's person, neither let me give flattering titles unto man.

22 For I know not to give flattering titles; in so doing my Maker would soon take me away.

CHAP. XXXIII.

Elihu requires Job's attention, while he pleads with him, in God's stead, and without terrifying him, 1-7. He blames him for being too earnest in vindicating himself, and for irreverently complaining of God, 8-13. He shows how God instructs men by dreams, afflictions, and messengers; that repenting they may find mercy, 14-30. He calls on Job to answer, or patiently to attend to his discourse, 31-33.

WHEREFORE, Job, I pray thee, hear my speeches, and hearken to all my words.

2 Behold, now I have opened my mouth, my tongue hath spoken in my mouth.

3 My words shall be of the uprightness of my heart; and my lips shall utter knowledge clearly.

4 The Spirit of God hath made me, and the breath of the Almighty hath given me life.

5 If thou canst answer me, set thy words in order before me, stand up.

6 Behold, I am according to thy wish in God's stead; I also am formed out of the clay.

7 Behold, my terror shall not make thee afraid, neither shall my hand be heavy upon thee.

freely reprove what he thought wrong in them, without respect of persons. Indeed, he was not used to give flattering titles to any man, and he knew it would displease his Maker; therefore, as he feared his awful displeasure, and desired mercy from him, he was determined to avoid them.—The original word signifies, to give an additional name, as a title of distinction.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The self-flattery of the human heart often prevents men from being convinced of their errors, or from acknowledging that they are: so that, even when not determined at all events to have the last word, they will imagine or pretend, some plausible reason for declining an argument, in which they have been foiled, whilst they hold their former sentiments, and criminate their opponents. Indeed, it is not worth while to persist in arguing with the pertinacious and self-sufficient, or with such as are "righteous in their own eyes:" yet sometimes they, who are accepted with God, and have truth and justice on their side, are unjustly charged with obstinacy and self-confidence.—An unprejudiced bystander frequently understands controverted points, better than the eager disputants; in almost all contests much may be reprov'd on both sides; and they who endeavour to distinguish betwixt what is right, and what is wrong, among all parties, will seldom be approved by the zealots of any, but will commonly come nearest to the truth.—If we perceive others in a fault, it is generally advisable, to mention it before them: and it is not sinful anger, if we are greatly displeased, to hear God dishonoured, his truths misrepresented, and men unjustly condemned, or fatally deceived.—It belongs to the aged to take the lead in conversation, and to teach wisdom; and modesty and deference towards seniors and superiors, always become the young. Yet reason is common to man, and God communicates both natural abilities and spiritual gifts, in measure as he pleases. "So that great men are not always wise, neither do the aged understand judgment:" and by an attention to the word, and dependence upon the Spirit of God, the young may become wiser than the aged, than their teachers, and their rulers. (Note, Ps. cxix. 98-100.) But this wisdom will render them "swift to hear, and slow to speak," and disposed to give others a patient attention, though they seem to argue inconclusively, and to say little to the purpose. However full we may think ourselves of suitable matter, for the conviction of others, and the termination of a controversy; and whatever uneasiness we feel in keeping silence, when others are discoursing, as we think, in a manner contrary to truth; we should remember, that it is indecent, and savours of arrogance, to interrupt them. Nay, if we were sure, that the Spirit of God suggested to us what we were about to say, we ought to refrain, until it fairly came to our turn to speak: for "the spirits of the prophets were subject to the prophets," and God is the source of order, and not of confusion. But the faithful minister of God, who is filled with the knowledge of his truth and will, and with zeal for his glory, and compassion for souls, must be greatly pained by every attempt to silence him: nay, indeed, he cannot be silenced; whatever be the consequence, he cannot but speak the things which he has heard and believed. (Note, Acts, iv. 13-22.) Times and seasons he will regard; but he must speak, that he may be refreshed, whether men will hear or forbear; and he must speak faithfully, without respect of persons, or knowing to give flattering titles; for "he is not a man-pleaser, but a servant of Jesus Christ;" and is ambitious, whether present or absent, of being accepted of him. (Notes, 2 Cor. v. 9-12. 16. 1 Thes. ii. 1-8.)

deliberately, and with recollection. He meant to speak his undisguised sentiments, in the plainest and most instructive manner; he was the creature of God, dependent on him, and accountable to him; from whose life-giving Spirit he derived his being, and rational nature. Job might therefore stand up before him, to make the best of his cause. He had desired an impartial judge to be appointed in God's stead, to decide upon his appeal: (Notes, ix. 25-34. xiii. 20-23. xxxii. 3-7. xxxi. 35-37.) And, behold, here was one according to his wish, a man like himself, who would neither terrify nor hurt him; as the glorious God might have done, if he had entered into judgment with him; nay, who would not bear so hard on him as his other friends had done.

V. 8-11. Elihu had heard Job's words, and did not condemn him upon suspicion, as his friends had done. He did not accuse him of being a hypocrite, but as having spoken language unbecoming a man of piety. He had so strenuously insisted upon his own integrity, that he seemed to say, "I am clean without transgression, I am innocent; neither is there any iniquity in me." Job had not said exactly these words; nay, he had avowed the contrary doctrine: but he had used incautious expressions which admitted of such a construction. The other words charged upon him were nearly what he had spoken. (Notes, x. 4-7. xl. 1-4. xvi. 17-22. xxiii. 8-12. Marg. Ref.)

V. 12, 13. In this thing at least, Elihu maintained, that Job had been culpable; he had charged God foolishly and unjustly, as if his dealings with him were causelessly severe. But he ought to have recollected the infinite greatness of the almighty Sovereign; so that it was the height of madness and presumption to contend with him. He gives no account of his conduct; and which of his creatures hath a right to demand an explanation of his reasons, in those things which he sees good to conceal? (Notes, xl. 1, 2. Dan. iv. 34-37. Matt. xx. 1-16. Rom. ix. 19-21. xi. 33-36.)

V. 14-18. In many things God acts as a sovereign, who explains not the meaning of his orders; but in general he shews himself a merciful and kind Father. He does not ask men what methods he should use, but he employs such as are most proper. He speaks to them in various ways, and with frequent repetitions; yet they are so dull, careless, and prejudiced, that they perceive not his meaning.—Elihu lived before there was a written revelation, and therefore that grand medium of communication is not mentioned; but God then frequently spake to men in dreams and visions; and thus, in the dark and retired hours of the night, he caused them even in their sleep to attend to him, and deeply impressed his instructions on their memories. This was intended, not to enable men to understand the reasons of the Divine dispensations, but to withdraw them from their sinful purposes, and from their proud rebellion; that, being humbled in repentance, and made sensible of their guilt and vileness, they might be preserved from that destruction of soul and body, into which they were about to be hurried. Nay, the long-suffering of God, by preserving men from sudden and violent death, when living in sin, kept back their souls from hell, and gave them space for repentance.

V. 19-26. When men disregard the warnings, and despise the patience of God, he often sends severe afflictions. And if Job had been afflicted on this account, instead of murmuring against God, and justifying himself, he ought to have considered what sins he had committed, and what duties he had neglected. For God, in love, often confined men to beds of sickness, and filled them with exquisite pain in every part, causing them to loathe even the most necessary or delicious food, and reducing them to mere skeletons; and whilst it appeared, that the body was about to drop into the grave, the poor sufferer was perhaps affrighted, lest the soul should fall into the hands of the destroyers.

(Note, Ps. cvii. 17-20.) Yet all this tended to good, and often terminated well; especially if some pious person were sent as the "messenger of God," (as Elihu hoped he was to Job,) to be an interpreter of the painful dispensation, and of the truth and will of God, and to show the sufferer the way of pardon and peace. (Note, xvii. 1, 2.) As such interpreters were scarce, not one among a thousand being capable of the service, they were the more to be valued; for they would show the sinner the justice of God in his sufferings and condemnation; his way of pardoning and justifying the penitent believer; his sincerity and faithfulness to his promises; and the way of holiness. Such a messenger frequently proved the instrument of a man's conversion; and the Lord in mercy commanded his deliverance from the pit of destruction, through the ransom, or atonement, which he had appointed and revealed, even that of the promised Messiah; and sometimes restored his health, vigour, and comeliness, as if he were become young again. Thus the sinner was taught to pray unto God, and he forgave him; he had comfortable communion with him at his mercy-seat, and hoped to see his face with joy in heaven; and would be graciously recompensed for all the works of righteousness, which he had performed in humble faith and love.—Some interpret this Messenger, or Angel, of Christ himself, the Interpreter of God's will to man, the chief amongst the ten thousands of his saints and servants. But, as in general he comes to men by his messengers, or ministers; and as their instructions and encouragements are deduced from his mediation, and are made effectual by his gracious presence, it is not very material, whether we interpret the passage, of the messengers of God pointing to the Saviour, or the Saviour revealing himself by their ministry. It is equally immaterial, whether the words, "deliver him from going down to the pit," be considered as the language of Christ's intercession, pleading the ransom of his blood, in behalf of the sinner; or the words of the Father accepting of this plea, and giving command to save the sinner, satisfied with that appointed ransom. It cannot reasonably be doubted, but that Elihu had reference to the promised Redeemer, though he might also intend the sacrifices which prefigured the great atonement. (Notes, Gen. iii. 21. iv. 3-5. viii. 20-22. xii. 6, 7. 1 Pet. i. 17-21. Rev. xiii. 8-10.)

V. 27-30. Elihu further shewed, that God always observed the ways of men; and when any sinner humbly confessed his transgressions of his just and good laws, as unreasonable and unprofitable, being ashamed and weary of them, and grieved and self-condemned for them; he would "deliver his soul from going down into the pit" of destruction, and he should live to enjoy his favour. Thus he brought back sinners from the brink of ruin, to be enlightened in the living and life-giving knowledge of salvation. He awakened their consciences by visions; he visited them with afflictions; he sent them his messengers and his gospel; and by his goodness he thus led them to repentance and salvation. Therefore Job had no reason to think that God was become his enemy; but to hope that he should derive great advantage from his calamities.—The original is rather difficult as to the construction, and has been variously translated; but the grand outline of instruction is not at all affected by the different renderings.

V. 31-33. Elihu again demanded Job's attention, as he had much more to say; but, if he could answer any thing to what he had urged, he would have him speak before he proceeded, for he greatly desired to find that he was a righteous man, and to clear up his aspersed character. But if Job could not refute his charge, let him be silent, and he would proceed to instruct him further in true wisdom.—It seems that Job was so far convinced by his discourse, that he would not attempt an answer.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1-13. We ought always to discourse on religious subjects with seriousness, recollection, candour, sincerity, and plainness, if we expect to be heard with attention, and to convince and instruct others. When we have evident truth on our side, we may often convince our opponents that they cannot stand

CHAP. XXXIV.

Elihu calls on the wise to judge in the cause; and charges Job with arraigning the divine justice, 1-9. He affirms, that the all-powerful and all-perfect God cannot do iniquity; and vindicates his dealings with men, 10-30. He shews Job, that he ought to humble himself before God, and sharply reproves his words, 31-37.

FURTHERMORE Elihu answered and said, 2 Hear my words, <sup>O</sup> ye wise men; and give ear unto me, ye that have knowledge.

before the tribunal of God, by shewing them that they cannot justify their conduct before a fellow-sinner, who cannot disown nor hurt them, while he pleads against them in the behalf of God.—In the heat of controversy, and when greatly afflicted and tempted, we are apt to utter words which cannot be justified; and if a worse construction be put upon them than we intended, we need not wonder, and should not be offended.—Public offences should be publicly rebuked, or retracted, to prevent scandal; but we may allow a man's general character to be good, and yet reprove him for particular offences. If we seem to justify our whole conduct, and murmur against God, in this we are not just; for when we adopt this conduct, the subject impeaches the sovereign, and the foolish sinful worm arraigns the conduct of the wise and righteous Lord of all! The infinite power and authority of God should deter us from thus contending with him; for he will not, he cannot, submit his conduct to our judgment. But when we consider that he excels the noblest of his creatures in all things else, as much as in his majesty and greatness, and is in all respects consummate perfection, we must perceive that every objection to his dispensations is rebellion and ingratitude.

V. 14-33. The general tendency of all the Lord's dealings with men, is to lead them to repent, and to turn unto him; but the proud careless rebel does not regard, though God speak to him again and again. The works of creation proclaim his eternal power and Godhead, and leave all those without excuse, who neither worship him, nor are thankful. He speaks by conscience; but her voice is silenced by the clamorous demands of men's lusts and passions. Terrifying dreams convey forcibly salutary alarms, but, unless the Lord open the ear, and seal the instruction, they are speedily forgotten. The judgments of God on others have a warning voice to us, and should serve to withdraw us from our sinful purposes, and to induce us to humble ourselves before him, that we may be kept from the pit of destruction; whilst his merciful protection of us, when others are cut off, and we are in danger, should lead us to repentance. When these methods are ineffectual, sharp afflictions become the voice of God. Wasting sickness, and excruciating pain, mar our relish of every comfort, and remind us of death and eternity. This proclaims the vanity of the world, the evil of sin, the power of God's wrath, our need of mercy, and the danger to which we are exposed. But how many repeatedly endure all this, yet remain unhumiliated, and unchanged! It is, however, a token for good, when the servants and ministers of God are sent to interpret to the afflicted his dispensations and word. This is a good service, and it is lamentable that so few are qualified for it, and take pleasure in it; and it is a most important additional charity, when the sick in hospitals are diligently attended by faithful instructors, as it often proves the means of salvation to their souls. But Christ himself is the only effectual Interpreter; by his spirit he shews the sinner the way of acceptance and salvation; who, believing, receives the gift of righteousness, and partakes of sanctification; and, through the ransom of the atoning blood, his prayers are answered, his soul is rescued, and, perhaps, his health and comforts are restored; he comes with joy before the mercy-seat, and beholds, by faith, the countenance of his reconciled Father, while he waits for the Saviour's appearing to judge the world, with animating hope of receiving that crown of righteousness which is laid up for him in heaven. In short, the eyes of the Lord are upon all the ways of the children of men; he sees them when committing their secret abominations; he sees them when, convinced of guilt, they condemn themselves, abhor their crimes, are covered with shame, and filled with fear of wrath, and when weary of their sins they long for deliverance; and he will assuredly have mercy upon them, and save them.—By what means soever we are kept back from the pit to be "enlightened with the light of the living," we shall bless the Lord for them at last, and should bless him for them now, though painful and distressing. To the end of our lives, corrections are the needful and salutary means of keeping us near, or bringing us nearer, to God; and, as such, are not only to be submitted to, but to be valued as pledges

4 Let us choose to us judgment: let us know ourselves what is good.
5 For Job hath said, "I am righteous: and 'God hath taken away my judgment.
6 Should I lie against my right? my wound is incurable without transgression.
7 What man is like Job, who drinketh up scorning like water?
8 Which goeth in company with the workers of iniquity, and walketh with wicked men.
9 For he hath said, "It profiteth a man nothing, that he should delight himself with God.
10 Therefore hearken unto me, ye men of understanding: far be it from God, that he should do wickedness; and from the Almighty, that he should commit iniquity.
11 For the work of a man shall he render unto him, and cause every man to find according to his ways.
12 Yea, surely God will not do wickedly, neither will the Almighty pervert judgment.
13 Who hath given him a charge over the earth? or who hath disposed the whole world?
14 If he set his heart upon man, if he gather unto himself his spirit and his breath;
15 All flesh shall perish together, and man shall turn again to dust.
16 If now thou hast understanding, hear this: hearken to the voice of my words.
17 Shall even he that hateth right govern? and wilt thou condemn him that is most just?

of his love: for it is better to be chastened of the Lord, than to be condemned with the world."—Finally, we should desire to justify others, as far as consists with truth; but a wise man will be afraid of too strenuously justifying himself; he will rather hearken to reproof, and receive instruction, that he may increase in wisdom and knowledge.

NOTES.
CHAP. XXXIV. V. 1—4. Elihu, having paused to hear whether Job had any thing to answer, proceeded to call on those present to attend to his discourse. He addressed them as men of wisdom and discernment, and doubted not but that their understandings would decide whether the expressions which Job had used were proper or not, as readily as the palate distinguishes the taste of meat; "For the ear should try words, as the mouth tasteth food." This ought to be the case, and was so with men of knowledge. He desired, therefore, that certain principles might be laid down, according to which they might form a judgment; and that they would confer among themselves, and come to an explicit determination on the subject.
V. 5—9. In vindicating his character, Job had used language which seemed to imply an intention of fully justifying himself; and, whilst he complained that God dealt rigorously with him, he expressed himself so vehemently, that he appeared to charge God with injustice; when urged to confess his crimes, he still more earnestly protested his righteousness, and a determination not to accuse himself falsely: and, in his bitter complainings, he spake of his wound as incurable, without admitting that his transgressions had deserved it. (Notes, ix. 14. 17—24. x. 4—7. 14—17. xvi. 17—21. xxi. 7—16. xxvii. 2—6. xxxi. 35—40.) These expressions induced Elihu to conclude that Job allowed himself in an astonishing license of language; that he took pleasure in scoffing at the works and truths of God, as well as in scorning the warnings and counsels of his friends; and that he agreed in principles and practice with wicked men, whose company he seemed to prefer, and whose conduct he encouraged; having, indeed, asserted, that no profit would accrue to those who delighted in the service of God: yet Job by no means intended all that Elihu charged upon him. He had not spoken precisely all the words which Elihu, quoting from memory, attributed to him; those which he had used, might admit of a more favourable construction; and other parts of his discourse plainly shewed that his deliberate judgment widely differed from the sentiments apparently conveyed by some of his detached expressions. He had repeatedly owned that he was a sinner; and he spake of the wicked as reserved to the day of wrath and destruction. (Note, xxi. 27—30.) But Elihu did not condemn Job as a hypocrite; he therefore quietly submitted to his reproof, choosing, as we may suppose, rather to bear more blame than he deserved, than to vindicate himself when he knew that he had been criminal.—Who goeth, &c. (8.) (Note, ii. 10.)
V. 10—15. Elihu next laid down the principle by which he desired that Job's conduct might be tried. It must appear to every pious mind, impious and blasphemous, to intimate that God was capable of committing injustice; but whatever expressions seemed to imply, that he punished without cause, partook of this impiety, and, as Job's words implied this charge, they must be 18 Is it fit to say to a king, Thou art wicked? and to princes, Ye are ungodly?

19 How much less to him that accepteth not the persons of princes, nor regardeth the rich more than the poor? for they all are the work of his hands.
20 In a moment shall they die, and the people shall be troubled at midnight, and pass away: and the mighty shall be taken away without hand.
21 For his eyes are upon the ways of man, and he seeth all his goings.
22 There is no darkness, nor shadow of death, where the workers of iniquity may hide themselves.
23 For he will not lay upon man more than right; that he should enter into judgment with God.
24 He shall break in pieces mighty men without number, and set others in their stead.
25 Therefore he knoweth their works, and he overturneth them in the night, so that they are destroyed.
26 He striketh them as wicked men in the open sight of others;
27 Because they turned back from him, and would not consider any of his ways.
28 So that they cause the cry of the poor to come unto him, and he heareth the cry of the afflicted.
29 When he giveth quietness, who then can make trouble? and when he hideth his face, who then can condemned. On the contrary, it was certain that the righteous Judge of all would render unto every man according to his works, punishing no one above his deserts, nor suffering any of the wicked to escape with impunity, yet graciously rewarding the good works of his upright servants.—And surely none could think that the almighty Sovereign of the world would pervert judgment! His perfections and authority being undervied, independent, and absolute; he must be all-sufficient for his own glory and felicity; he could not be biased by fear or partiality. Indeed, if he were disposed to exercise rigorous justice, and to set his heart upon, or against, man; the world was so absolutely at his disposal, that he needed only to recall the spirit, or soul, and withdraw the breath that he had given, and all the inhabitants of the earth would perish, without being able to make the least resistance. (Notes, vii. 17—21. ix. 4—13.)

V. 16—19. In the next place, Elihu appealed to Job himself, who was reputed to be a man of understanding. Could he suppose that the Lord resembled those earthly princes, who hate right, and abuse their authority, and who are unfit to rule, being the scourges of mankind? If he abhorred that idea, would he allow God to be most just, and yet condemn his conduct in afflicting him? It would be highly criminal, and extremely imprudent, to revile an earthly monarch as a tyrant, or even his nobles as iniquitous and oppressive; or even to charge blame upon them, without cause. How impious and infatuated must it then be to accuse the almighty God in such a manner, whose justice is as absolute as his authority; and who in perfect impartiality regards the poor as much as the rich, having formed both as his creatures, and made the one poor and the other rich, in his providence! (Notes, Ex. xxiii. 6—9. Acts x. 34, 35. Jam. ii. 1—7.)
V. 20—30. Men respect the great, from dread of their resentment, as well as desire of their favour: but God could have no inducement of this kind. When he saw good to inflict vengeance, he was able to cut off the most powerful, by sudden and irresistible stroke; as earthquakes, or other calamities, sometimes in a moment overwhelmed whole multitudes, at midnight, when asleep, or most secure; at once they were troubled and destroyed, even the mightiest of them, without any human concurrence. (Notes, Gen. xix. 24, 25. Ex. xii. 29, 30. xiv. 24—31. 2 Kings xix. 35—37. Ps. lxxiii. 18—22.) His omnipresence and omniscience could not be evaded, nor his omnipotence resisted; (Marg. Ref.) yet he would punish none above their deserts, or use his power to oppress, that any one should have just cause to institute a process against him. But, whilst he crushed the mightiest without number, (or search, as if he must stay to examine evidences,) and exalted others to their stations; he knew all their secret sins, and therefore destroyed them at once. Many he thus openly punished, for an example to others, as malefactors are scourged or executed publicly; especially apostates, or impious persons, or vile hypocrites; who, by their oppression of the poor, caused them to cry and pray unto him, and he heard and avenged them. (Notes, xxii. 5—14. xxiv. 2—12. xxxi. 16—23. 38—40.) In short, if he were pleased to give outward prosperity or inward peace, none could interpret it to be, or, "if he impart peace, who can condemn man as wicked?" (Notes, Rom. v. 1, 2. viii. 28—34.) but if he in

CHAP. XXXV.

Elihu further reproves Job's words in justifying himself ; and shews, that the effect of man's conduct extend to man alone, and not to God, 1-8. He observes, that if God hear not the cry of the oppressed, it is because they do not address him aright, 9-13. He exhorts Job to patience, and trust in God, 14-16.

ELIHU spake moreover, and said, 2 <sup>a</sup>Thinkest thou this to be right, <sup>b</sup>that thou saidst, <sup>c</sup>My righteousness is more than God's ?

3 For thou saidst, <sup>a</sup>What advantage will it be unto thee? <sup>b</sup>and, What profit shall I have, <sup>c</sup>if I be cleansed from my sin ?

anger withdrew his protecting or comforting presence, none could obtain the benefit or enjoyment of it; and whole nations were as liable to these changes as individuals. Indeed, one great design of all these dispensations was, to deprive ambitious hypocrites of the authority which they sought by iniquitous means, and abused to bad purposes; ensnaring, corrupting, oppressing, or fatally prejudicing the people, over whom they aspired to reign.—Even Elihu seems to have had some suspicions that Job was a dissembler; and spake as if he was at a loss how to reconcile his calamities with his character for piety; and thought the case would have been plain, if he had been a hypocrite, advanced to authority, but now depressed, lest he should lead the people into sin and misery. Yet, he did not venture to condemn him, but hoped the best.

V. 31-37. Elihu maintained, that it behoved Job to speak and act in a far different manner under his afflictions; it was meet that any man, in his situation, should express himself with humble resignation to the will of God; should consider his afflictions as a chastisement, and a call to repent of his sins; and should promise greater watchfulness against them. He ought to intreat the Lord to teach him what he did not know, and to convince him of those sins which he did not recollect; determining by divine grace to repent and forsake them. But could Job suppose, that things would be ordered according to his mind, whilst he continued so rebellious? Did he expect that God would change his plan, to please him? No; he would certainly recompense him for his harsh and rash speeches and other sins, whether he rebelled against the correction, or submitted to it. This was the Lord's doing, not Elihu's; though he warned him, and advised him to retract his words, and humble himself before God. Let him, however, give the best reasons for his conduct, that he was able; for hitherto any wise man would determine Job's words to have been very erroneous. He desired, therefore, that his conduct might be fully investigated, nay, that his heavy trials might continue till he was humbled, and brought to retract his confident self-justification: for he had, in fact, made an excuse for wicked men, as if their conduct was not so ruinous and hateful as it really was. So that rebellion against Providence, was added to his other sins: yea, he had concluded his protestation of innocence with an air of insulting triumph over his opponents; and had multiplied his words against God himself. (Notes, xxxi. 35-37.)—Job had given some ground for these charges; but Elihu evidently made the worst of his expressions, and criminated him much more than the Lord afterwards did. (Notes, xxxviii. 2. xl. 1-8. xlii. 1-9.)—Several of the clauses in these verses are to us very difficult; and consequently are differently interpreted. That which appeared the most satisfactory interpretation has been chosen. Bishop Patrick paraphrases the thirty-third verse thus: 'Hast thou addressed God in this manner? Answer me that question; for God will recompense it, if thou dost despise such good counsel; which perhaps thou wilt choose to do; but so would not I. Speak therefore thy opinion.'

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1-15. It is generally prudent to conciliate the affections of all, whose benefit we seek, or whose help we want, by acknowledging in them the good which they really possess; and when we address men, as endued with wisdom and piety, we cogently admonish them to act consistently with their character: nor should we withhold this tribute of respect from any, because we deem them in some respects mistaken.—An appeal may safely be made to the plainest person, whose understanding is enlightened, and whose heart is sanctified, by the Spirit of God, and who is well versed in the Scriptures, how far such and such sentiments, expressions, tempers, and actions, accord with the Christian character. And he will readily decide a case, when impartially stated, with more accuracy, than the most sagacious of those, who are wise in this world, and lean to their own understanding." For he chooses to himself the oracles of God as his standard; and by experience, observation, and conference with his brethren, he has his "senses exercised to discern good and evil," and to know, approve, and savour that which is good. (Notes, Phil. i. 9-11. Heb. v. 11-14.)—It is discordant in the ears of a spiritual man, to hear persons intent on justifying themselves; or reflecting on the dealings of God, as unjust or unkind; or supposing that they suffer without remedy, or transgression. He listens to their words with astonishment, and is apt to suspect them of pride, and contempt of God. He thinks, that they imitate the example, and join themselves to the company, of evil-doers, and he is ready to infer, that they consider religion itself as unprofitable. This jealousy for the honour of God, and deep acquaintance with the depravity of man, will indeed sometimes render pious persons too suspicious; and too severe in censuring such as vindicate themselves from unjust aspersions, in an unguarded manner: and thus they will fail of making due allowance for circumstances of peculiar temptation and difficulty. But the believer, when convinced that his reprover means well, and when conscious of having deserved censure, will, on calm reflection, submit to such rebukes as are too rigorous, rather than engage in minute exculpation.—All pious men have ever agreed, that it is delightful and profitable to serve God: they all abhor the thought of charging him with injustice: they are satisfied that his moral perfections are undeviated, absolute, and unchangeable, as well as his power and authority: they know that he readily could, and justly might, consign the bodies of all the millions of the human species to the dust, and their souls to destruction: and it appears to them madness to provoke him "in whom our breath is, and whose are all our ways." And whilst life and hope remain, they cannot deliberately allow, that a sinner can have cause to murmur, but are sure that he must have great cause to be thankful.

V. 16-37. It is evident, that it must be immensely more dangerous and atrocious to arraign the conduct of God, than that of an earthly prince. Yet all our murmurs, when duly investigated, will be found to have a tendency to the blasphemous sentiment, that the Governor of the world hates right; and to condemn Him who is most just; and therefore they are pregnant with rebellion. But indeed his impartiality and condescension are infinite; "he accepts not the persons of princes; nor regards the rich more than the poor." When he seeth good to punish, destruction is inevitable; and frequently cometh with sudden and dreadful surprise, upon the careless multitude, or the haughtiest potentate. "His eyes are upon the ways of men, and he seeth all their goings:" there is no secret cavern, or midnight darkness, "where the workers of iniquity can hide themselves," or their crimes, from their omnipresent Judge; or where they may shelter themselves from his omnipotent indignation. But he will never give any man cause to appeal from his judgment, by laying upon him more than he deserves. He knows the works of all men, and sees far more evil in every one, than we suspect: therefore in his most terrible judgments his justice must be acknowledged; and even when "the wicked shall be turned into hell, and all the nations that forget God;" the publishing of their crimes will demonstrate the righteousness of their dreadful doom. But the vengeance of the Almighty, either here or hereafter, will be most terrible against apostate professors: those who have deliberately rejected his authority, and his gospel; and such as have cloaked their ambitious designs under a hypocritical profession of piety. Men of these characters will perhaps be disappointed, and exposed in this world, for a warning to others, and to prevent the effect of their crimes. It is, however, certain that they who have the Lord for their adversary must eventually be wretched. But, if "he be for us, who can be against us?" If he give quietness, who "can create trouble?" The slanderer's envenomed tongue, the persecutor's cruel rage, the tempter's malicious assaults, with pain, poverty, tortures, and impending death, in vain attempt to render those miserable whom God comforts; or to separate his people from his love. This "indeed is the heritage of the servants of the Lord;" but it is also proposed to the chief of sinners: and chastenings often concur with his word in warning them to flee from the wrath to come. Surely then it is meet that we should address ourselves unto God, when he afflicts us, with the language of humble submission: confessing our transgressions, and praying to be further enlightened in the knowledge of his truth, and in an acquaintance with our own sinfulness; and that he would incline and enable us to repent, and to forsake all our sins; that "where we have done iniquity, we may do so no more." When we are brought to this frame of spirit, we shall see it unreasonable to expect that matters should be according to our minds; we shall perceive, that whether we refuse or choose, God will chasten us as much and as long as he seeth good; and probably this will be, till we kiss the rod and welcome the correction. But, alas! how often are our tempers and conduct contrary to this reasonable state of mind! When we have spoken all we know, men of understanding and wisdom will agree that we have uttered things which sprang from ignorance, or error, or savour of pride and ingratitude; nay, we shall often upon a review be conscious of it ourselves. As far as this emboldens wicked men in their crimes, or hardens them in their prejudices, it should be openly retracted; and all concerned should combine to convince the offender, and bring him to repentance. This is an act of genuine friendship; but we should be careful not to do it with asperity; or to represent the words and actions of our brethren as worse than they are. It is, however, desirable for us all to be tried completely; and even to have our afflictions continued, till they have done their work: for it is better to be severely reprov'd, and chastened, than to be left to persevere in rebellion, to prosper in iniquity, to triumph in error, and to multiply words and transgressions against God.

NOTES.

CHAP. XXXV. V. 1-3. As Job attempted no answer, Elihu proceeded still further to reprove his improper language. Job had laboured to prove,

4 I will *answer thee, and *thy companions with thee.

5 *Look unto the heavens, and see; and behold *the clouds which are higher than thou.

6 If thou sinnest, *what doest thou against him? or *if thy transgressions be multiplied, what doest thou unto him?

7 If thou be righteous, *what givest thou him? or what receiveth he of thine hand?

8 Thy wickedness *may hurt a man as thou art; and thy righteousness *may profit the son of man.

9 By reason of the multitude of oppressions, *they make the oppressed to cry; they cry out by reason of *the arm of the mighty.

10 But *none saith, *Where is God *my Maker, *who giveth songs in the night;

11 Who *teacheth us more than the beasts of the earth, and maketh us wiser than the fowls of heaven?

12 *There they cry, but none giveth answer, *because of the pride of evil men.

CHAP. XXXVI.

Elihu requires attention, while, with truth and knowledge, he shews the justice of God in all his judgments, the designs of his chastisements, and the profit of making a right use of them, 1-15. He reproves, warns, and counsels Job, 16-21. He reminds him that the power of God is uncontrollable; and that his works and dispensations should be magnified, but cannot be comprehended, 22, 33.

ELIHU also proceeded, and said,

2 *Suffer me a little, and I will shew thee that *I have yet to speak *on God's behalf.

3 I will *fetch my knowledge from afar, and will *describe righteousness to my Maker.

that there was no exact discrimination in this world betwixt the righteous and the wicked; and he seemed to Elihu to assert that it would be no advantage to any one, (as it had been none to him,) to seek diligently to be cleansed from sin. This he thought equivalent to saying, "that his righteousness was more than God's;" for he did his duty; but God did not fulfil his promises, but punished him more severely than he deserved. Job had not spoken exactly these words, and certainly had no such meaning: but he had dropped some expressions capable of being thus understood; and it was proper they should be noticed, lest others should make a bad use of them. (Notes, ix. 22-24. x. 5-7. xxi. 7-16. xxvii. 2-6.)

V. 4-8. In answer to Job, and those, whether present or absent, who were disposed to side with him, Elihu called his attention to the visible heavens; the very clouds of which were higher than he, out of his reach, and not in the least affected by his conduct: it must then be evident, that the infinitely glorious God could not be either a gainer or loser by any of his actions. (Note, xxii. 1-4.) The most numerous and atrocious crimes, which men could perpetrate, would not interrupt the divine felicity; nor could any human righteousness profit God, or confer an obligation upon him. His government was therefore administered upon the purest principles of equity and wisdom, for the display of his own glorious perfections, and for the greatest good of the universe. And therefore, as the Lord acted upon such fixed and immutable principles; it was absurd and impious, to suppose that he deviated from rectitude, in any particular instance, to punish those who did not deserve it; or that piety could eventually prove unprofitable to the pious man himself.

V. 9-13. Job had stated that the oppressed cry out, but are not delivered, and that the oppressors remain unpunished: (Note, xxiv. 2-12.) and Elihu, in shewing how the wickedness of some men made others to suffer, attempted to account for this. The afflicted cried out indeed by reason of the power of their oppressors; but they did not repent, or seek comfort from God, who can fill the hearts of his servants with joy, and their mouths with songs of praise, in the darkest night of distress. (Notes, Ps. xlii. 6-10. Hab. iii. 17-19. Acts xvi. 25-28. Rom. v. 3-5.)—The Creator had endued men with a capacity of knowing more than the beasts and fowls; having formed them capable of receiving the knowledge of his being and perfections, and thus of seeking help and comfort from him, under their troubles. But they, who only groaned under distresses, without repentance, faith, or prayer, did no more than the brutes, which cry out when they are pained. Therefore they receive no answer from God, when suffering under the oppression of proud tyrants; for he would not regard the vain and rebellious complaints of ungodly men. (Notes, Judg. x. 13-16. 2 Sam. xxii. 37-42. Prov. i. 24-31. Is. lvii. 13. lviii. 2-12. lix. 1-8. John ix. 27-34.) And indeed Job's complaint, that the Lord would not hear his cry, (xix. 7.) as Elihu supposed, originated from a similar cause: for though he might not be an ungodly man; yet he had not duly humbled himself under his afflictions, and therefore was disregarded.

V. 14-16. Job had frequently expressed himself, as not having any hope, that the Lord would appear for his relief; but Elihu reminded him, that God set judgment before him, and always acted in wisdom, equity, and faithfulness: he would therefore certainly do him justice; and he would likewise shew him mercy, if he duly sought it; and he exhorted him to trust in him, and wait his time. But as he had yielded to unbelief and impatience, the Lord had visited him in anger; and so long as he indulged the same rebellious spirit, he would not know him, or take any favourable notice of him, in his greatest extremity. Therefore he hitherto had spoken to no purpose, but had multiplied inconsiderate and sinful words, in disputing with his friends, when he ought to have been humbling himself before God.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

It is very useful to appeal to men's reason and conscience, concerning their conduct in those things which have been evidently faulty; for many speak and do in haste, and when warmed in dispute, what they will not deliberately justify. Indeed, the expressions of men, when angry, are often worse than their meaning; and though it is unfair to condemn them for inferences which they disallow; yet it is proper to shew them, how their words may produce bad consequences; in order that they may be humbled for their rashness, and speak more cautiously another time.—The immensity of the works of God may lead us to some feeble apprehensions of his infinite majesty: and the consideration, of his undevied and unchangeable glory and felicity, should convince us, that all his commandments, judgments, and dispensations result from his essential perfections. He forbids and punishes that which is evil in itself, and tends to misery: he commands and delights in what is good and tends to felicity, without any possible accession to his own infinite blessedness. This is the proper display of his own glory, and demands the tribute of our adoring praise. The Judge of all the earth cannot but do what is right, though we are often incapable of discerning the reasons of his conduct: but, as we have all multiplied transgressions against him, and as he cannot receive any thing from us, which he hath not first given unto us, we can have no cause to complain of hard measure when afflicted: and as our Judge is now, as a Saviour, on a mercy-seat, we can have no reason to conclude, that it would be in vain for us to repent, to seek forgiveness, and to cleanse ourselves from our iniquities; and when impatience, pride, and unbelief suggest such conclusions, we associate ourselves for the time with the workers of iniquity, and expose ourselves to just reproofs.—Whilst a righteous man becomes a public blessing, in proportion to his station in society; the exalted oppressor multiplies iniquities and miseries; and though the oppressed, through their own criminality, may fail of finding redress, or though God may leave them for a time under this trial for their good: yet he will certainly at length punish the haughty oppressor. But how few of the afflicted, who groan under their miseries, enquire after God, and trust in his name! The most, even of the wretched, disregard their obligations and accountability to him, and refuse to repent and humble themselves for their sins, and to seek forgiveness and comfort from him. But to humble believers he causes light to arise in the darkness, and he fills their mouths with songs of deliverance, in the midnight season of tribulation.—God our Creator having formed us after his own likeness, hath made us vastly more capable of knowledge than the brute creation: but, alas! sin has rendered us more stupid in many things than they: and, except we partake of renewing grace, we are prone to murmur under our sufferings, without enquiring after the cause, or the remedy. These howlings of distress are not acceptable to God: they are vain, selfish, and consistent with the grossest impiety and enmity; and therefore we need not wonder, that impenitent sufferers are left, without succour, to endure the just punishment of their obstinate wickedness, even from the hands of oppressors more wicked than themselves.—If pious persons are betrayed into any degree of a similar spirit, and delay to humble themselves under the afflicting hand of God, or to seek all their help and comfort from him; they may expect that their trials will be continued, till they are reduced to a better temper. In all these things "the Lord is a God of judgment, and by him actions are weighed." All his works are in wisdom and justice; and he sheweth mercy to those who humbly trust in him. But when his corrections excite obstinacy, impatience, and unbelief, he will infuse more anger into the bitter cup; he will withhold comfort, and appear to disregard the extremities, to which even his people are reduced. Then their rebellious murmurs only add to their guilt and vexation, and they multiply words without knowledge, in attempting to excuse themselves. Let us not then, under affliction, prolong our own misery, by keeping at a distance from a throne of grace, standing in our own vindication, expecting help from other quarters, or despairing of help from God: but let us call upon him in our troubles, and he will hear us, and we shall praise him.

NOTES.

CHAP. XXXVI. V. 1-4. As Job still received Elihu's reproofs in humble silence, Elihu again demanded his attention: indeed, he supposed that he was entitled to it, as he was speaking in the cause of God, and to vindicate his righteousness, which had been apparently denied. He had some arguments to adduce, which had not occurred to the other speakers, and which were brought

8 And <sup>h</sup>if <sup>h</sup>they be bound in fetters, and be holden in <sup>h</sup>cords of affliction;

from afar, or originally derived from divine revelation: he promised that he would admit of no flattery, calumny, or sophistry into his discourse: and he was confident that his knowledge upon the subject, was so clear and complete, as to be worthy of their most serious regard.

V. 5—15. In this passage Elihu laid down his system of divine providence; in which he spake more accurately than the other disputants had done, without aiming to decide upon Job's character. Yet he seems to have leaned to the sentiments of Job's friends, that, in some way or other, temporal deliverance and prosperity, or the contrary, generally distinguished betwixt the righteous and the wicked.—He observed that God was mighty in strength and wisdom; yet, contrary to the common example of the wise and powerful in this world, he despised not the persons, or the causes, of the meanest of his subjects; he overlooked none, and oppressed none; and he noticed the most ignorant, poor, and contemptible of the earth, and would surely do them justice; yea, they all partook of his common benefits, and, the vilest likewise, of his special mercies, when willing to seek for them.—Elihu further stated, that wicked men were not under the peculiar protection, which secured the righteous; and therefore their lives were more exposed, and generally terminated prematurely; and this indeed might often take place by the judgment of God, in doing right to the poor whom they had injured. But assuredly He continually noticed and took care of his people: sometimes he advanced them to temporal authority; they were at all times watched over, with as much care as the greatest monarchs, whose lives were of vast importance to multitudes; and they would be sure at last to be established for ever, in the most exalted and glorious state. If in this world, they were imprisoned by oppressors, or any other way afflicted and distressed, it was intended for their benefit: the Lord would then shew them whatever was sinful in their conduct; thus he would dispose them to receive instruction, and enforce their obligations to repent, and turn from every sin, and follow after holiness. (Notes, Heb. xii. 4—13.) When they were brought more humbly and faithfully to submit to, obey, and worship him, he would restore and increase their comforts and prosperity, and they would spend their lives in peace and pleasure. But if any continued obstinate and impenitent, they might expect to be cut off by some sudden judgment, and to perish in their sins. Thus hypocrites, who eloked their secret crimes with a shew of piety, treasured up wrath: because, when bound with the cords of affliction, they refused to humble themselves and cry for help unto God. They were therefore often cut off prematurely, or left to apostatize, and spend their lives amongst the most atrocious sinners, increasing their own condemnation: and at last they would be doomed to misery with the most abominable transgressors, such as were the unclean inhabitants of Sodom. (Marg.) But the poor in spirit, the humble and contrite, would certainly be delivered from their afflictions; and their oppressions would prove lessons of useful and durable instruction.—Exceeded. (9.) Or, strengthened themselves.

V. 16—21. Elihu next applied his doctrine to the case of Job. He was persuaded, that God would before that time, have delivered him out of trouble, and restored him to liberty, comfort, and plenty, if he had behaved properly under correction. But he had copied the language, and sanctioned the rebellions, of the wicked. It was not therefore necessary to determine what his former character had been: at present he certainly was suffering justly; and, as the wrath of God was kindled against him, instead of persevering to provoke the Lord by presumptuous murmurs, he ought to be very careful what he spake: for a single stroke of Omnipotence (the explosion of divine wrath,) would take him away beyond the reach of any ransom: so that, if he had possessed all the riches and power in the world, it would not be accepted, or be availing, for the deliverance of his soul. He ought not, therefore, so earnestly to desire (or pant after,) the night of death, that he might rest from his sufferings: for in his present rebellious state of mind it was likely to come in wrath, if at all; and he should remember, that men by it were cut off, in that place, or state, in which they had lived and were found, and their sentence was then rendered irreversible. He ought therefore to take heed, that he allowed himself in no sin, and especially that he did not unjustly reflect upon God; for it had appeared from many of his expressions, that he actually chose iniquity rather than affliction. (Marg. Ref.)—No doubt, Elihu in this conclusion was far too severe on Job: for, though he had impatiently and rashly wished for death, he had never at all insinuated that he preferred sin to suffering.

V. 22—23. Elihu here again renewed his attempt to convince Job of his presumption, by representing to him the incomprehensible majesty and power of God. It was madness to contend with him, who alone was able to deliver or exalt; or to dictate to him, who alone could teach man wisdom; and from whom Job should have sought instruction, how to behave under his afflictions, and obtain deliverance from them. Who could arrogate a right to enjoin to the Sovereign of the universe, the fountain of life and excellence, how He ought to act? Or to find fault with any of his appointments? It was far more proper for men to remember their duty, and to magnify, admire, and praise the works of God, as presented to their view; than to pass a judgment upon those dispensations, which are beyond their comprehension. The most distant view of the creation, and of the course of nature, discovered his eternal power and Godhead, to those who would behold them: but the greatness of the infinite and eternal God could not be known, or searched out. Even the rain, which Eliphaz had before noticed. (Note, v. 8—16,) displayed exceedingly his wisdom and goodness: as he pleased, the clouds distilled their contents, in gentler rains or heavier showers, for the abundant benefit of man. But none could fully comprehend how the clouds were formed and spread abroad, or the thunders produced in those pavilions of the Almighty. For whilst a glorious light was at one moment diffused over the clouds, at the next that light was veiled by the water, drawn even from the bottom of the sea; or the thick clouds seem to darken the sea even to the bottom. Thus by dreadful thunder-storms, inundations, or deluges, the Lord sometimes executed his judgments upon sinners; and at others he made the earth yield in abundance food for man and beast. The same clouds, which just before were a blaze of light, immediately after obscured the light of the sun, and darkened the air. The distant noise portended the approaching tempest; and the cattle had an instinctive dread of it, whilst the vapours were ascending or condensing in the atmosphere.—It seems evident that a terrible storm, actually approaching, suggested these thoughts to Elihu.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—15. When wise and pious men speak in God's behalf, and shew his righteousness in all his precepts, judgments, and appointments, they are entitled to our strictest and most patient attention. But they who attempt this service, should watch over their own hearts, and beware of insincerity and corrupt motives; for many professed teachers of divine truth are evidently consulting their own interest and reputation, and not seeking to glorify God and edify their brethren. They should likewise carefully weigh their principles, and seek wisdom from him who alone is, strictly speaking, "perfect in knowledge;" that their instructions may be scriptural, convincing, and edifying; that none may be able to object to them; and that they may not fairly admit of a bad construction.—In the glorious character of our God, almighty power, infinite wisdom, and omniscience, harmonize with the most perfect justice, and the most condescending goodness and mercy: and, whilst his providential kindness reacheth to the most rebellious of his enemies on earth; he receiveth to his special favour the meanest and vilest, who trust in his mercy, and seek to return to him and his service. May we enjoy his love, and copy his example; and not despise the poor and weak, or treat with undue severity, or disdain, the most atrocious criminals.—The wicked, however, have no security for the preservation of their lives and comforts; they are interested in no promises, but lie under dreadful threatenings, and are liable every moment to be cut off in their sins: though spared from day to day, that they may have space for repentance; or if they neglect it, to fill up the measure of their iniquities. But God watches over the righteous continually: no evil can befall them; they are more honourable in his sight than the greatest princes; and they shall all of them be exalted, and established as kings and priests, before him for ever. In this world they have many tribulations, in order to humble and prove them, and to do them good at last. For they are thus brought acquainted with the evil of their own hearts, and all their deviations from the holy law of God: and disposed to receive instruction, and to return from iniquity: being forgiven and accepted, their graces are increased, and their evil tempers subdued: and in proportion as they obey and serve the Lord, in simplicity and diligence, their souls at least prosper, and divine consolations cause them to spend their years in pleasure; except as they are sometimes suspended for their greater good. But when they disobey and turn aside, they mar their own comfort: and whilst they continue unhumiliated under rebukes and chastenings, they prolong their own sufferings, and bring their characters into doubt, both with themselves and others. The impiety, even of the wicked, is greatly aggravated by their obstinacy under afflictions and terrors. Many of them thus provoke God to cut them off: and in this way hypocrites especially fill up the measure of their iniquities; for it is undeniable that judgments and mercies make less impression upon them, than upon the openly profane: and whether sinners die in youth, or live long to heap up wrath, their case is dreadful, and their eternal portion must be among the abominable and unclean.

V. 16—33. It is lamentable, that men professing godliness should ever so yield to murmurs and despondency, as to seem to favour the cause, and justify the objections, of the wicked. Surely they ought to be plainly rebuked, and even warned not to deceive themselves, but fear lest that wrath come upon them, which awaits "the workers of iniquity:" for how can it be determined that they are the servants of God, who are imitating the conduct of his enemies? It is therefore proper to remind any one, who murmurs against the Lord's appointments, of the power of his wrath, the strictness of his justice, and the unchangeableness of his judgments. If he cut off the sinner by the stroke of his wrath, all the treasures and all the power on earth will be utterly unavailing. Nay, the great ransom of the Saviour's blood will not profit the finally impenitent and unbelieving. The ransom indeed is of infinite sufficiency: but if rejected till the night of death cometh, the door of mercy is then shut, and hope expires for ever. Yet men often desire, and even rush upon death, to get rid of present uneasiness, whilst perfect strangers to this great atonement; as if in haste to be for ever removed from the sound and hope of salvation! And believers seldom vehemently wish for death, when the evidences of their acceptance are most bright, or their graces in most lively exercise. All then should remember, that men at death are cut off in their place, and their condition becomes eternally irreversible. (Note, Ex. xi. 3—6.) Instead therefore of shrinking from adversity, we should seek deliverance from the love and power of sin; and prefer the greatest suffering to the least iniquity. Yet, alas! most men choose iniquity rather than affliction: 'They ease their cares by sinful pleasures, they increase their wealth by sinful pursuits, escape their troubles by sinful projects, and evade sufferings by sinful compliances.' (Henry.) But this is a miserable choice, of which they will at length bitterly repent: for the favour of God alone can exalt or make us happy. He alone can teach us to behave wisely and live comfortably in every situation: he needs no counsellor, and allows of no accuser; but justly requires all to admire the discoveries of his glory which they can understand; to adore the depths they cannot comprehend; and to stand in awe of his unsearchable wisdom, power, and authority.—Every appearance in nature at once displays, and conceals, his infinite glories; much remains incomprehensible: but enough is seen to call forth our gratitude, animate our praises, or excite our consternation. The clouds and rain, with the thunders and lightnings, declare his goodness, and proclaim the power of his wrath. Each object bears a double aspect; and whilst the worker of iniquity ought to tremble, the true believer should rejoice. (Notes, Ps. xcvi. 1. xcix. 1—3.) "It is the glorious God that maketh the thunder," as well as that fertilizes the earth; and the children should hear with pleasure their Father's voice, even when nature seems convulsed, and he speaks in terror to his enemies. (Note, Ps. xxix. 3—11.)

NOTES.

CHAP. XXXVII. V. 1—13. In these verses Elihu continues his discourse. The nearer approach of the thunder-storm caused him inwardly to tremble, as if his heart was moved out of its place. He therefore called on Job, and all the company, to hearken, with attention and awe, to the thunder, as the majestic voice of God. Whatever account might be given of the second causes, which produced these tremendous effects; the great First Cause must be acknowledged in them, who thus alarmed the minds of careless sinners.—The giving of the law was attended by tremendous thunders and lightnings; and so was the Lord's speaking to Job out of the whirlwind. (Notes, xxxviii. 1. Ex. xix. 16—20. Heb. xii. 18—21.)—By the Divine mandate, the flashes of lightning darted from one part of the sky to the other; along with the crashing roar of the thunder, which, not reaching the ear so soon as the lightning did the eye, seemed to follow it. This voice of God surpassed all other sounds, in majesty and solemnity: nor could any one stay, or prevent, the effects of it when he pleased thus to speak in terror. In this he wrought marvellously, and all his works were great and incomprehensible. Whether he commanded the snow, the gentler rains, or the more impetuous showers sweeping all before them, he acted in a manner which man could not explain. By tempestuous weather he put a stop to the works of men, as if their hands were sealed up: and this gave them leisure to consider "his works;" whilst the beasts retired, and lay inactive in their dens. When the wind blew from the south, terrible whirlwinds were excited; and when it shifted to the north, cold weather ensued: but who could understand the manner, in which these changes were wrought? Indeed, the wind might be called the "breath of God;" and by it, when he pleased, the inexplicable frost was produced, and the rivers were contracted, or formed into a solid substance. The thick clouds were wearied and worn out, by watering the earth: and often by the shining of the sun on them, they appeared bright, and the beautiful rainbow was formed. But all these were turned about by

CHAP. XXXVIII.

The Lord, out of the whirlwind, challenges Job to answer him, 1-3. By enumerating his mighty works in creation and providence, he convinces Job of ignorance, 4-30; and of weakness, 31-41.

THEN THE LORD answered Job <sup>a</sup>out of the whirlwind, and said, the full benefit of the revolving seasons, whilst they who are most informed cannot evade the inclemency of the weather, or prevent storms, or secure themselves against their effects; so the simplest believer may receive the benefit and comfort of divine mysteries, and the Lord's protection, whilst the proudest and most learned objector cannot annul his counsels, alter his dispensations, or escape his vengeance. Our wisdom, then, consists in accommodating ourselves to the situation allotted us; and in deriving benefit, as we can, from those appointments which we cannot alter; in accepting of proffered mercy in the Lord's way; in submitting to his correction and his righteousness; and in leaving all difficulties to another world.—When Providence takes us off from secular employments, we should occupy ourselves more entirely in meditating on the works of God, in the study of his word, and in the exercises of devotion; else, in what do we surpass the beasts, who retire and remain in their dens?—The weather is altogether of God's appointment; it is generally ordered in mercy as well as in wisdom, for the common good; and if at any time it be really afflictive, it is sent for correction, and to call us to repentance and prayer. But the ill opinion which men entertain of the Divine management, is evident in their incessant murmurs in this particular; though the result of the whole system, through the year, generally demonstrates the folly and ingratitude, as well as the rebellion, of their complaints. Believers should carefully avoid such peevishness; there are no bad days as the Lord makes them; but we make ourselves many by our sins.

2 Who is this that <sup>b</sup>darkeneth counsel by words without knowledge?

V. 14-24. In all our discourses of the works of God, we either are conscious of our own ignorance, or we soon expose it. "We cannot order our speech by reason of darkness," or teach one another satisfactorily in these sublime subjects; we may well be ashamed of our best attempts to magnify the glorious excellencies and works of God. Indeed, we have nothing to boast of on any account, but must still confess, not only that we are unprofitable servants, but that we are wretched sinners. In short, "with God is terrible majesty:" we cannot search him out, or comprehend his designs; but if our meditations lead us to more admiring adoring views of his greatness, holiness, justice, wisdom, and goodness; if they terminate in a deeper sense of our own ignorance, vileness, and sinfulness; if they warn us to reverence and submit to him, and to cease from our own wisdom; the effect will be honourable to him, useful to us, and edifying to our brethren. And, whatever scenes we witness, whatever changes we experience, we may stay our minds on him, who will give strength to his people, and bless them with his unspeakable peace.

NOTES.

CHAP. XXXVIII. V. 1. Both Job and his opponents had appealed to the Lord, and earnestly desired that he would decide the controversy. Job had silenced, but he had not convinced, his friends: Elihu had silenced Job, but had not brought him to plead guilty; and his character was yet undecided. The debate would therefore have terminated inconclusively, had it not pleased God to interpose: but he soon made Job sensible of his faults; and he convinced his friends that he was a righteous man, and that they had done him injustice: and thus all parties were humbled and profited by the transaction.—With terrible majesty the Lord spake out of the cloud or tempest, which, probably, was raised to a vehement whirlwind whilst he was speaking. (Marg. Ref.) He addressed Job, and continued Elihu's argument; 'but in inimitable words, excelling his and all other men's in the loftiness of the style, as much as a thunder doth a whisper.' (Bp. Patrick.) He rebuked Job first, and then his friends: but Elihu, who had come nearest to the truth, and had spoken with reverence, seriousness, and temper, was not reproved, though in some things he bare too hard upon Job.—In attempting to comment on these words of the Almighty, we may well say, with Elihu, "If a man speak, surely he shall be swallowed up." The very attempt might create a tremor, lest it should be reproved, "as darkening counsel by words without knowledge;" and, as the whole discourse was intended as a reproof of the want of reverence and modesty, which an eminently wise and pious man had fallen into, it stands as a beacon, cautioning the expositor to keep at a distance from the same perilous rock. But, if giving the supposed meaning, in language more intelligible to the plain modern reader, though immensely less suited to the sublime subject, may assist in understanding the passage; the attempt will meet with a pardon from a merciful God, and perhaps a candid perusal from men.

V. 2. As Elihu had spoken last, it might have been thought that he was addressed; but Job knew that he was especially intended, and this first question seems to have brought him to a more becoming temper. He had discoursed upon the counsels of God, and the methods of Providence; but he had the counsels of God, and executed his commands in every part of the earth; whether by drought, or excess of rain, he corrected a guilty nation, or by moderate rain he shewed mercy to a favoured land.

V. 14-20. Elihu next called on Job to consider, and explain all these wonderful appearances; and if he could not, to confess his presumption, in arraigning the more mysterious dispensations of the Divine government. Did he know when God made all these arrangements? Or could he understand how light and fire were produced from the watery cloud, or the splendid rainbow from the dark cloud? Could he explain in what manner the clouds were balanced to move about, continue in the air, or descend in showers? or how the air grew warm, and his garments too heating, when the gentle south wind blew? Had he assisted in spreading the expanse of heaven, which was immovably strong, and in which, as in a mirror, the reflection of the Divine glory might be perceived?—Mirrors were, in those days, formed of brass, cut into a proper form, and highly polished. (Note, Ex. xxxviii. 8.)—If Job could explain these matters, and teach those present how to speak of God, it would be very acceptable; for they were conscious that they could not order their discourses on such subjects with clearness or certainty, because of their own ignorance, and the darkness that rested upon the manner in which the works of God were performed. Indeed, Elihu must acknowledge, that all he had spoken was beneath the subject, and unworthy of the Lord's acceptance, or of being mentioned to him at all; for he found his thoughts and powers swallowed up, and lost in this bottomless abyss.

V. 20-24. Whilst Elihu was speaking, he observed, that the wind had scattered the clouds, and the lightnings were ceased, and that the north wind had brought on fair weather, bright and resplendent as gold; for that is the meaning of the original word. (Marg. Zech. iv. 12. Marg.) In these, and all the works of God, his glorious and terrible majesty were displayed. How presumptuous, then, must it be, to contend with him, when his ordinary works were too dazzling for man to look upon!—It is evident, that, towards the close of his discourse, Elihu spake as one in great confusion. Some conjecture, that, what is rendered, "Fair weather cometh out of the north," referred to some glorious appearance in the north, which intimated the Lord's immediate presence, as about to speak. Elihu, therefore, hastened to conclude, briefly declaring, that the almighty God was unsearchable, and incomprehensible; that he infinitely excelled all creatures in power, justice, and judgment; that he would oppress none, nor afflict any without cause. Men ought, therefore, to stand in awe of him, and fear to offend him, or to murmur against his appointments; for he disregarded all the supposed wisdom of those who deemed themselves authorized, or qualified, to scrutinize and find fault with his conduct. (Notes, xxxiii. 12, 13. Is. xl. 12-17. Dan. iv. 34-37. Rom. ix. 19-21. xi. 33-36.) Elihu evidently thought that Job had been thus irreverent and presumptuous; and when the Lord himself spake, he brought exactly the same charge against him. (Notes, xxxviii. xl. 1, 2.)—In what other ancient book can be found such exalted and just sentiments and reasonings on the perfections and works of God, as every where occur in the sacred volume?

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1-13. The attentive mind will perceive affecting displays of the power, wisdom, goodness, and majesty of God, in the operations of nature; and the terrors excited by some of them, should remind us of that tremendous scene which will usher in "the day of judgment, and perdition of ungodly men." If the thunder-storm caused the heart of pious Elihu to tremble and start; if Moses was exceedingly alarmed before mount Sinai; if even faith and love to God cannot utterly preserve men from dismay in these inferior circumstances of terror, what will be the horror and despair of the wicked at that tremendous season? Oh that men would attentively hearken unto the voice of God, who, in various ways, "warns them to flee from the wrath to come;" and from his mercy-seat, with a voice of less terror, but of more glorious excellency, invites them to accept of his salvation, and be happy!—All irrational creatures obey the voice, and subserve the will, of the great Creator; surely, then, we, whom he hath endued with reason, should be shamed into obedience and submission! We behold the marvellous works of God, and partake of his bounty, in the revolution of the seasons, and the change of the weather; for heat and cold, rain, snow, or dry weather, have their several beneficial effects. But who can fully comprehend the whole mechanism of nature, or rather these operations of God? How incompetent, then, must we be to explain the mysteries of his incomprehensible and eternal existence, of his decrees, or of his universal government! But as they who know nothing of natural philosophy receive expressed himself rashly and irreverently, as if God had afflicted him without cause, and with rigour and cruelty; thus he had rendered the subject more obscure, and the auditors more perplexed, than before, and had only manifested his own ignorance. "But who was he, that" thus "darkened counsel by words without knowledge?" Did an ignorant sinful man presume to speak such language concerning the infinite God! Did Job, the servant of the Lord, go thus in company with his enemies! JEHOVAH would not, in such a cause, deign to vindicate his wisdom, justice, goodness, or truth, against so presumptuous an accusation: but he would make the accuser feel his own ignorance and impotence, and shame him out of his indecent and unreasonable murmurs: he would teach him to contend with his equals, the potsheards of the earth; and not to cite God to his bar, as if he were his compeer or his judge. (Marg. Ref. Notes, Is. xlv. 9-11. Rom. ix. 19-21.)

V. 3. Gird up, &c. Job had spoken of "ordering his cause before God," of "demanding of him, and being answered," and of "coming as a prince before him;" and he had grievously complained, that he could not get a hearing. (Notes, xlii. 15-22. xlii. 3-7. xxxi. 35-37.) But now the time of trial was come, and the Lord summoned him to collect all his courage and resolution; and without delay to prepare his answers to some previous questions, which he had to propose to him. (Notes, xl. 1-8.)

V. 4-7. These abrupt questions, which could only be answered in the negative, were suited to impress Job with a conviction of the infinite knowledge, wisdom, and power of the eternal God; and of his own extreme ignorance, and incompetency to form a judgment of his appointments. Was he present, counselling, or assisting, when the earth was created? Did he appoint the dimensions and proportions of that immense structure? Could he understand whence its stability arose, or how it was fixed as a building on a firm foundation? (Notes, Gen. i. 1, 2. Ps. cii. 25-28. civ. 6-9. Prov. viii. 22-30. Is. xl. 12-17. 21-24. Heb. ii. 10-12. Rev. iv. 9-11.)—At that period, the first and brightest productions of creative power, the stars in the firmament, or rather the holy angels, the morning-stars of the creation, "the sons of God," (Luke, xx. 36.—Note, i. 6.) witnessed, adored, and rejoiced with exultation. (Notes, Heb. i. 13, 14. Rev. v. 8-14.) And would Job, who had then no existence, find fault with the work which they admired? Would he presume to direct the government of what he had no hand in forming? Or would he suppose the dispensations of providence less perfect than the work of creation? But if this exceeded his comprehension, would he dare to decide on other still more mysterious works of God?

V. 8-11. Job was next called to consider the mighty ocean. At the Creator's word, the seas separated from the dry land, issuing forth as an infant from the womb. The clouds that hover over the ocean, and the unknown shores which surround it, form, as it were, the swaddling band and garment of it, 'as if it were but as a little babe in the hands of God.' The vast hollows of the earth are its appointed place, in which it is confined, as with bolts and bars: and though it is vehemently tossed by tempestuous winds, and the tides roll its billows to the shore, as if it were about to cover the earth again; yet, at the Lord's command the storm subsides, and the tide rolls back; and he deals with this most furious element, as easily as with an infant: and this, not so much by the barrier of the shores, as by virtue of that inexplicable property, which we call gravitation.—Thus he stays the proud or swelling waves of the sea, and assigns them their bounds, which they cannot pass. (Notes, Gen. i. 9, 10. v. 10-12. Ps. xciii. 3, 4. cvii. 6-9. Prov. viii. 26-30. Jer. v. 20-25. Matt. viii. 23-27.) But had Job any hand in contriving or effecting this? Or could he comprehend how it was done?

V. 12-15. It was evident, that the things hitherto mentioned had existed before Job was born; by which he might be led to reflect upon the eternity of God, and contrast it with the few days of his life. But had he, during that short time, given orders for the succession of night and day? At the appointed hour, the morning is ushered in, and the light gradually overspreads the horizon, and drives away the wicked from their deeds of darkness. Immediately the earth assumes a new form, as the wax from under the seal; and appears in fresh beauty, as arrayed in splendid garments. Thus the wicked are disappointed of their expected success, and are detected and crushed, notwithstanding their lawless pride and violence. But did Job command this beneficial and welcome change? Did it depend on his care and management? Nay, could he explain in what manner the sun, at such an immense distance, enlightened the earth? Or could he supply the want, should his beams be withheld; or command them to come when he pleased?

V. 16-18. The vast ocean covereth immense treasures, and wonderful productions of the Creator. But had Job surveyed these repositories, or taken an inventory of their contents? Had he visited all the deep and dark caverns of the earth? Or was he fully acquainted with the nature and consequences of death, and with all that which takes place in the invisible world? Nay, had he traversed the whole of the earth? so as to be able to show its dimensions, and describe all the lands, climates, and creatures which it contains?

V. 19-21. Could Job fully explain the nature, and declare the origin, of light and darkness? What they are, and whence they come? Could he trace the streams of them back to the fountain, so as to visit their residence, and bring them forth to accomplish his own purposes? Or shew whither the light retired during the night; and point out the abode of darkness after the approach of the sun? Was he born before the present order was established? and had long observation acquainted him with these matters, which to all else were incomprehensible? (Notes, Gen. i. 14-19. Deut. iv. 19. Ps. xix. 1-6. civ. 19-24. Is. xlv. 7.)—Though modern experiments have enabled men to form some theories concerning light and colours; yet how very little do we yet know about them, or what they are, and how they are!

V. 22-30. To convince Job of his ignorance, and of the unsearchable wisdom and knowledge of God, some other perplexing questions were proposed to him. The snow and hail seem to be brought forth out of a treasury. But had Job ever entered thither? Did he understand the manner of their production? or were they at his command? With them the Lord troubles and fights against his enemies, when he sees good: but could Job employ them in his own cause, after the same manner? Could he explain the way in which the "morning light is divided, and the east," (or, from the east,) "scattered over the whole earth?" Could he suppose, that any but God directed the clouds, as a water-course, to convey the waters, above the firmament, to their appointed places, attended by the thunder and lightning; so that even the uncultivated parts of the earth were watered, and made to produce food for the beasts which inhabit them? Could any account be given of the formation of the rain, into larger or smaller drops? Was any one instrumental in the production of the dew, the ice, or the hoar-frost? Were not all these entirely the work of God, and inexplicable to man? Thus the course of rivers was arrested, the fluidity of the water changed, and covered as with a pavement of stone. (Notes, v. 8—16. xxxvi. 22, 23. xxxvii. 1—13. Gen. i. 9. vii. 10—21. Ex. ix. 18. Ps. xxxiii. 7. lxxv. 9—13. civ. 10—15. cxlvii. 8. 15—18. Jer. xiv. 20—22.) These are most stupendous displays of the Divine power, and only unnoticed because common.

V. 31—41. The different seasons of the year are marked out by the relative situation of the fixed stars to the earth, and to the sun. But could Job prevent the effects of those constellations, which presided either over the genial spring, or the dreary winter? (Note, ix. 9—13.) Could he even explain how these effects are produced? If he felt his ignorance and weakness in this matter, let him learn to keep his proper place, and to leave the government of the world to its Creator.—Could he in a dry season command the clouds to water the earth from their abundance? Would they, or the lightnings, obey his orders, and execute his purpose? Was he the author even of his own scanty measure of wisdom and knowledge? Could he explain what thought was? Could he keep a register of the clouds and their contents, and of the commerce which they carried on? Could he seal up those "bottles of heaven," and prevent more rain from falling; "when the dust was melted into a mass, and the clods were joined together?"—Would he undertake to provide food for the lions? was not even this far beyond his power? Nay, he could not provide for the young ravens, when deserted, or expelled from the nest, by their natural call seem to cry unto God for food. (Notes, Ps. civ. 10, 11. 19—23. 27—30. Matt. vi. 25—32.) In short, whatever Job considered, above or beneath, within or around him, he must perceive the infinite wisdom, knowledge, power, and goodness of God; and feel his own incapacity to discourse on such subjects, as he had presumptuously ventured on.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—11. The condescension of the God of glory, in making himself known to sinful man, for his humiliation, instead of executing vengeance upon him for his rebellion, demands our highest admiration, and our warmest gratitude: and the most tremendous method by which he abases a sinner in the dust, should be acknowledged as the effect of his mercy; for it tends to comfort, and joy, and salvation.—When the wisest of men presume to intrude into those "secret things which belong to God," and to be wise above what is written, they are sure to "darken counsel by words without knowledge," and perhaps undesignedly to serve the cause of impiety, or scepticism: so that numbers, who have been vain of their acute, learned, and accurate reasonings on mysterious subjects; and who have been admired for their sagacity and judgment, will meet with such a rebuke from the Lord, as Job did, or rather one far more severe. We should then be very careful, in all our investigations, not to exceed our assigned limits, to go out of our depth; or to leave the friendly shore of the word of God, to launch into the immense ocean of infinities. Conscious of our ignorance, guilt, and weakness, it becomes us to speak with trembling humility and reverence, when the perfections, decrees, or operations, of God are our subject: for "such knowledge is too high for us, we cannot attain unto it." (Note, Ps. cxxxix. 6.)—But indeed none of us are suitably impressed with awe of the infinite majesty of God; our appeals to him generally savour of presumption, and we should not be able to answer before him, as we are apt rashly to think we could.—Though he sometimes deigns to reason with his creatures, and to demonstrate his equity in his dealings with them; yet he more generally silences the arrogant objector, by a display of his infinite power, authority, and majesty: as more becoming the Sovereign of the world. Indeed, all nature proclaims his glory; no creature fully comprehends his works, but contemplation of them, with adoring and exulting triumphant praises, forms the delight of each intelligent being, in exact proportion to the extent of his powers, and the degree of his holiness. Thus, when the creation was finished, and appeared in all its beauty, "the morning-stars sang together, and all the sons of God shouted for joy." Yet they discover still brighter glories in the mysteries of redeeming love; into which especially "they desire to look," with ceaseless admiration: (Notes, Eph. iii. 9—12. 1 Pet. i. 10—12:) and, in proportion as the new-creating Spirit renders us like to them in knowledge and holiness, we shall become capable of participating their exalted joys, and find pleasures of which we now have scarcely a conception.—But, in other things, the boasted knowledge of mankind is in fact a very small matter: the best informed must perceive their own ignorance in every thing; none can fully understand the most common phenomena of nature; and after all the discoveries of modern times, most of them remain, in some respects, as inexplicable as ever.—Indeed, we are of yesterday; our days are passing away as a shadow; and an humble willingness to be taught of God, and to credit his "sure testimony," as contained in the sacred oracles; with a diligent attention to our proper interest and duty, as fallen creatures under a dispensation of mercy, are infinitely preferable to all the learning of the schools. Not that learning should be depreciated; provided it be accompanied with humility, kept in its proper place, directed to its proper objects, and not allowed to interfere within the province of revelation and faith. Yet even in natural things man's scanty measure of knowledge avails him but little; for he still finds himself unable to effect those alterations, which might give him ease, or conduce to his comfort.—But, whatever the Lord doeth must be right; because he is infinite in wisdom, justice, truth, and goodness. As the world was created, so it is governed, by him, exactly as it should be. The contemplation of his wise and surprising contrivance, in the economy of nature, should silence all our objections to his providential dispensations, and teach us to desire, that he would choose and manage all for us as he pleases. His power, which formed and bounds the mighty ocean, and which is displayed wherever we turn our eyes, should remind the sinner of the power of his wrath; convince him how vain it will be to oppose his authority; and warn him without delay to seek pardon and reconciliation: and it should teach the believer to rejoice in his friend and protector; who can say to the proudest persecutors, or to the hosts of hell, "Hitherto shall ye come, and no further: and here shall your proud rage be stayed."

V. 12—41. The innumerable creatures, varied almost infinitely, which God hath formed, may teach us that the reasons of his conduct may be numerous, when we can discern none. The revolutions of day and night, and of the seasons of the year, with all the profusion of bounty, with which they are crowned, and of which his enemies richly partake, should encourage us to expect large blessings from his covenant-love in Jesus Christ, and to be followers of him in love to our enemies. And, as he feeds the lions, and the ravens which cry unto him, let us learn to ask and expect our daily bread from him. The constancy and exactness, with which natural effects are produced, should remind us of the faithfulness of the Lord's promises, and the immutability of his counsel, and excite us to be constant and exact in our course of daily worship and obedience. The consideration of his all-sufficiency and eternity should teach us to choose his favour, as our portion and blessedness for ever: and every view which we take of his manifested perfections, is suited to convince us of his right to our love and obedience, of the evil of sinning against him, and of our need of his mercy and salvation. The humiliating recollection of our comparative insignificance, should check our pride and presumption, and lay us low in reverential fear and self-abasement.—It would be in vain for us to command the clouds to rain, or to attempt to stay these "bottles of heaven;" but if we call upon the Lord in our necessities or fears, he will regulate all these things for our good. In fine, the more we contemplate, the more we are confounded with the vastness and the variety of these discoveries of our God. All his ways are in wisdom; and every thing will concur to ruin his obstinate enemies: but all things work together for good to them that love him.

NOTES.

CHAP. XXXIX. V. 1—4. In this chapter some animals are selected, the nature, or situation, of which is peculiarly illustrative of the power, wisdom, and manifold works of God: and the questions proposed concerning them, were suited to convince Job how little he knew or could do. The several species of the wild goats, and hinds, are continued from age to age; but not by the care of man. He does not know how long they go with young, or at what time they will bring forth: nor if he did, could he in any way tend on or assist them, as he can the domestic animals. Though they bring forth their young with difficulty and pain, yet they need no human help; they soon forget their sorrows; and their young being active and vigorous, are in a short time able to shift for themselves, as if they fed upon corn; or even by entering into the corn-fields, notwithstanding the precautions of the owner.

10 Canst thou bind the unicorn with his band in the furrow? or will he harrow the valleys after thee?

11 Wilt thou trust him, because his strength is great? or wilt thou leave thy labour to him?

17 Because God hath deprived her of wisdom, neither hath he imparted to her understanding.

V. 5—8. Some animals are evidently created for labour; others scorn the yoke: the tame ass is formed for a patient drudge; but the wild ass cannot be subjected. (Notes, xi. 7—12. Gen. i. 26, 27. ix. 1, 2. xvi. 12.) He has liberty as it were by charter: the barren wilderness is his residence, and its scanty productions his subsistence: yet it would be vain to attempt enticing him into populous cities, for the sake of a more plentiful support; or rendering him obedient to a driver's voice. But who gave him this liberty? Did not the Lord? And would Job suppose that he had not wise reasons for so doing? And as no human power can alter the nature of this animal, or render him serviceable to man; so it is equally impossible to alter the appointments of God, whether we are satisfied with them or not.

V. 9—12. The rhinoceros, (which is supposed to be here intended,) is possessed of immense strength, (Marg. Ref. Note, Num. xxiii. 22;) and might perform proportionable labour, if he could be made to bear the yoke as the passive ox does. Yet Job was not so absurd as to expect this from him; nor would he depend on his assistance to plough his land, or gather in his harvest: knowing that it would be vain and dangerous to attempt anything of this kind with so powerful and fierce a creature. But was it not more perilous to quarrel with the allotments of the Almighty?

V. 13—18. The Creator hath divided his gifts among his creatures as he saw good; and in this, and in every other thing, his will and wisdom should be implicitly submitted to. To the peacock he hath given most beautiful plumage; but it is not remarkable for anything else.—The ostrich hath wings and feathers; but it is vastly larger than other birds, and unable to mount aloft on its wings. (Marg.) It is likewise remarkable for its stupid insensibility in various respects. The female bird prepares no nest for her eggs, but lays them upon the earth, to be warmed by the heat of the sun, and that of the sand or dust, without any further attention. She has no instinctive remembrance that they are liable to be trodden on, and destroyed, by man or beast: she is as regardless of her eggs and young, as if they did not belong to her; and is destitute of care and fear about them. For God hath not imparted to her that instinctive wisdom, which he hath to other creatures in this particular. But when she is alarmed for her own safety, she uses her wings to assist her in running, and in this manner exceeds in swiftness the fleetest animals; and when pursued by those who thus attempt to take her, she seems to despise both the horse and his rider.

V. 19—25. This description of the horse hath been universally admired, as imitatively sublime. It especially relates to those horses which are used in war; and in which the Eastern countries have always excelled.—God alone hath given the war-horse his strength and courage; (Note, Ps. cxlvii. 10, 11:) the flowing mane, which clothes his neck, adds to the fierceness of his appearance, and seems to indicate his triumph. (Note, Ps. xciii. 1, 2.) When going to the battle, he cannot be made afraid, or driven back, like the puny grasshopper: the snorting of his nostrils, by which he bids defiance to his enemies, is dreadful. He paweth with his feet, as if he would tear up the earth in his impatience to engage: he glorieth and exulteth in his strength, and in going out to meet the armed men: in his eagerness to start, and his fierceness and rage for the fight, he, as it were, devoureth the intervening space. He can scarcely wait for the signal for the battle, or stand still, because of his impatience; and he deems the dreadful alarm of the trumpet a joyful sound: he has an instinctive sense of the battle, at a distance; and is all on fire to rush amongst the captains, who with terrific shouts are marching to the assault.—Yet, is this fierce intrepid animal easily subjected to man, made to fear the touch of the whip, or spur, obey the motion of the bridle, or even the voice of the rider, and almost that of a child! So wonderfully hath God formed and fitted him for the service of man! (Note, Gen. ix. 1, 2.)

V. 26—30. The hawk is remarkable for the force with which it flies, and the skill with which it takes its prey: but did Job communicate to it those capacities by his wisdom? The species of hawk here meant is supposed to have removed southward at stated periods, for the sake of a warmer climate. In like manner, the eagle, which is remarkable for soaring higher than any other bird, and for building her nest in the most inaccessible situations, utterly disregards man's command. From her towering heights she seeks her prey; and by her most piercing sight sees it at a vast distance, and darts down upon it in a moment. Thus her young are trained up to suck the blood of the prey; and she resorts where the dead bodies of man or beast abound. (Note, Matt. xxiv. 26—28.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The infinite power, wisdom, and goodness of God, are legible in all the variety of his creatures: "He openeth his hand, and satisfieth the desire of every living thing," and watches over them all with constant attention. Such, as have no help from man, are taken care of, as well as those that have: and in like manner his people will surely be provided for and protected, either by, or without, the instrumentality of their fellow-creatures. Every species of animals reminds us of our ignorance and impotence: they continue, as God hath created them, and we can neither understand whence their different propensities arise, nor yet alter them: we often can derive no benefit from them; nay, some of them seem a nuisance to us, nor can we know for what purpose they were created. Yet we should acknowledge the wisdom of God, and submit to his will: we ought to be thankful for the benefit derived from some, and to be patient under the inconveniences occasioned by others: and we may learn from them, to confide in his kind providence, and to aim to answer the end of our creation.—Liberty is most valuable; yet the savage licentious freedom of the half-starved wild ass is not enviable. It is more desirable to be subject to wholesome laws, to labour, to be useful, and to live in plenty; than to set authority at defiance, and to live an indolent, unserviceable, and penurious life. In like manner, strength and power are only valuable when well employed; and the patient ox is preferable to the untameable rhinoceros: for one talent improved is far better than many misemployed.—It is very absurd for rational creatures to be vain of personal beauty, strength, courage, agility, or external decorations; when they are eclipsed in them all by the various species of brutes. God hath better endowments to confer on those whom he loves; and if he do not impart wisdom and grace, all the rest will prove a snare and a curse.—It is lamentable to observe, that many human creatures are more stupid, and hardened against their young, than the very ostrich, the disgrace of animal tribes. They willingly forget their wants, dangers, and interests; they take no care of their welfare, either in this world or in the next, any more than if they did not belong to them; and thus their unavoidable labour and pain become vain, and to bad purpose, for want of subsequent attention, and precaution about them; and by reason of the bad examples which they set, and the pernicious instructions which they give them. But we may cease to wonder at this, when we consider how stupidly insensible most men are to the interests of their own souls, which they neglect more fatally than the ostrich doth her young. By their contemptuous defiance or forgetfulness of God, or

God calls on Job to answer, 1, 2. Job humbles himself, and will proceed no further, 3-5. God requires him to shew by acts of power, that he is able to save himself, 6-14. The power of the Lord is shewn in the behemoth, 15-24.

MOREOVER, <sup>a</sup>the LORD answered Job, and said, <sup>b</sup>2 Shall he that contendeth with the Almighty <sup>c</sup>instruct him? <sup>d</sup>he that reproveth God, let him answer it.

3 ¶ Then Job answered the LORD, and said,

4 Behold, I am vile; what shall I answer thee? <sup>e</sup>I will lay mine hand upon my mouth.

5 Once have I spoken; <sup>f</sup>but I will not answer: yea, <sup>g</sup>twice, <sup>h</sup>but I will proceed no further.

6 ¶ Then answered the LORD unto Job <sup>i</sup>out of the whirlwind, and said,

7 <sup>j</sup>Gird up thy loins now like a man: I will demand of thee, and declare thou unto me.

8 <sup>k</sup>Wilt thou also <sup>l</sup>disannul my judgment? <sup>m</sup>wilt thou condemn me, that thou mayest be righteous?

9 Hast thou an arm like God? or <sup>n</sup>canst thou thunder with a voice like him?

their vain attempts to hide or excuse their sins, they plainly shew that he hath judicially deprived them of understanding.—Indeed, man by nature is prone to imitate the animals in their worst qualities. Like the wild ass he scorns the yoke of God; and like the wild bull in the net, he rages against his corrections. Even his courage is generally unreasonable, instinctive, and furious, like that of a horse. His feet are swift to shed blood, or to venture his own life, when ambition, avarice, or revenge inspire him. In this case he mocketh at fear in his fierceness and rage; and not only rushes upon the weapons of death, but upon the Divine vengeance, without hesitation. Yet would he be afraid as the grasshopper, if called to prefer his plain duty towards God, his family, and society, to the caprice of fashion, and the diabolical honour of revenge, in the midst of the ridicule and reproach of ungodly men! How would he then act, if called to venture, or lay down, his life in the despised cause of truth and righteousness? Moreover, men naturally glory in their own strength and prowess, and rejoice in ostentatiously displaying them; and are more disposed to seek renown by rendering themselves terrible, than by becoming useful.—The qualities of the horse, when united with his docility and promptitude to labour, are admirable; but when found in a rational creature, and separated from more useful dispositions, they become dreadful and detestable.—Even the eagles, which teach their young to suck up the blood, do not prey upon their own species; they leave that cruelty to man. Yet from each of these animals we might learn useful lessons: they almost all instruct us to attend to our own safety, and that of our offspring; and to secure ourselves, in some effectual refuge, from the dangers to which we are exposed. But God forbid, that we should be like the eagle only in soaring aloft and in keenness of sight, while we still look down to the earth for our prey, by ambition and worldly sagacity; or by using our religious knowledge, and our credit among Christians, to cloke ambition, covetousness, and worldly lusts? But, reverencing the Divine Majesty, and abasing ourselves before him in deep repentance, may we by faith and love mount upwards as on eagles' wings, till we obtain those things which are above, where Jesus sitteth on the right hand of God.

NOTES.

CHAP. XL. V. 1, 2. It is probable, that the voice from the whirlwind ceased for a short space, that Job might speak, if he could make any reply; but, as he continued silent, God answered his very thoughts, and in few words shewed him what he intended by his multiplied questions. Job had complained of the Lord's dispensations, as if he meant to "contend with him;" (Notes, xxxiii. 3-7. xxxi. 35-37.) but could Job give him any instructions how to govern the world? Did he think it wise to contend with Omnipotence? or, having arraigned the dispensations of his Maker, would he also presume to vindicate his own conduct, and to answer what had been spoken?—"Does he, who contends with the Almighty, draw back?" (E. Smih.) By a trivial change of the vowel points, this rendering may be admitted.

V. 3-5. At length Job ventured to speak; but not with that confidence which he had previously thought of. His friends had attempted to prove too much, and had only emboldened him in self-vindication: Elihu had reproved him with sharpness, and he had submitted to it. But the voice of God, and the declaration of his glorious perfections, and manifold works of wisdom and power, effectually convinced him of his rashness and irreverence, in speaking of God as he would have spoken of his equal. In this comparison, he perceived and acknowledged, that he was "vile;" a poor, mean, foolish, sinful creature, who ought not to have uttered one word reflecting upon the Divine conduct.

He was astonished at his own presumption, and could find nothing to plead in excuse; he would therefore be silent, in submission to the will and righteousness of God; having already spoken too often, and in a very unbecoming manner. (Notes, ix. 15-23. x. 3. xvi. 17-22. xlii. 1-6.)

V. 6-8. In order that Job might be still more deeply humbled, the Lord again addressed him in the same majestic and awful manner as before, requiring his attention and his answer; and he more expressly reproved him for insisting upon his own righteousness, in such a manner as to seem to his friends, and even to Elihu, to charge God himself with injustice. Did he then require that the Divine decrees respecting him should be reversed, because they had been too severe? Or, that the Lord should be deemed unjust in his judgments, rather than that he himself should be suspected of hypocrisy? Indeed, wicked men often murmured against Providence in this blasphemous manner; but would Job copy their example, and charge God foolishly? (Notes, ii. 10. xxxiv. 5-9. 31-37. xxxv. 1-3. 14-16. xxxvi. 22-33.) Would he allow his tongue such liberty, while vindicating himself from unjust accusations, or complaining of his sufferings, and the wrongs which were done him? Yet, this had been the tendency of many expressions, which he had used in the heat of dispute, and in the bitterness of his soul. (Note, vi. 26.)

V. 9-14. The Lord would not at all deign to argue the question of right with his servant; but insisted on that being taken for granted. "Shall not the Judge of all the earth do right?" (Note, Jer. xii. 1-4.) He purposed therefore to induce Job's unreserved submission, by making him sensible, that he was acting most absurdly and presumptuously, in attempting to decide on the conduct of the infinitely glorious God. (Notes, x. 3. xxvii. 2-6.) Let him then consider whom he was offending; let him compare his puny arm with omnipotence, or his feeble voice with the tremendous thunder; and then let him inquire, whether he was able to make his cause good against such an adversary? (Note, 1 Cor. x. 18-22.) But, ere he ventured any further, let him make trial of his strength against the most potent of his fellow-men. Let him collect all his forces, assume all royal authority and majesty, and appear upon a glorious throne, arrayed with every magnificent decoration, and all the insignia of royalty; let him then declare his fiery indignation against every one of the proud tyrants and oppressors of the earth, and issue out his orders, that they should all be abased and trodden down, wherever they lived; and that their faces should be covered as condemned criminals, and that they should either be put to death, or confined in dark and noisome dungeons. (Note, Esth. vii. 8.) And when, with a look or a word, he had effected this work, (as the Lord did in his own time and manner;) then it should be allowed that he had power sufficient to be his own deliverer and protector; though still unable to contend with the Almighty.

V. 15-24. There have been various opinions concerning behemoth, but probably the most ancient is the most true; namely, that the elephant is intended. The word is often used for quadrupeds in general; and more frequently for cattle, or animals which feed on vegetables, as distinguished from the carnivorous animals. This, however, is not exclusively the case; but probably it cannot be clearly shewn ever to mean any other than land animals; of which the elephant is the largest and most remarkable. It is also unlikely that the elephant should be totally omitted in this enumeration; and the several particulars seem best to accord with it.—The Lord reminded Job that he had made behemoth "with him;" both were his creatures, and behemoth is often found near the habitations of men.—This immense animal "eateth grass as an ox;" for if he devoured flesh as a lion, he could scarcely be either resisted or satisfied.

20 Out of his nostrils goeth smoke, <sup>33</sup>as out of a seething pot or caldron.

The strength of his loins and the sinews of his body are equal to his bulk; and it is known that the elephant often carries on his back a large wooden tower, with several men on it. His tail, or rather trunk, (for the word may mean either extremity of the body,) is very large, strong, and flexible, and by it he bears down all before him, as by the moving of a cedar. The "sinews of his thighs" are so interwoven, as to contribute very much to his vast strength; and his bones are so hard and firm, that they are like iron or brass. He is "the chief of all the works of God, that is, of this kind." Now it is evident that the elephant surpasses all other quadrupeds in size, strength, sagacity, and longevity; and yet is equally remarkable for his gentleness, when not provoked. He is content to feed upon the herbage of the mountains; and the other beasts play around him without dread of harm. He lies down to rest, not in a den as carnivorous animals generally do, but under the shade of the trees, or among the reeds and rushes, as fearless of any assailant. When he drinks, he seems as if he would empty a river; and makes no haste, not being in the least fear. He appears to be confident that he could drink up Jordan at once; he greedily looks to the water when he thirsteth, and will not be kept from it by any impediments or snares; but removes them all by his trunk, which is situated above his nose.—Probably, it was not become customary at that time to take, tame, and employ elephants in war, or in journeying, as it hath since been done. But, though man did not know how to deal with behemoth, the Creator had him entirely in his power, and could destroy him at his will. This thought was suited to remind Job not to contend against his omnipotent Sovereign.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—8. It behoves us to speak with great reverence and caution concerning the ways and works of God; for it will appear at length, that many of our expressions sprang from such corrupt principles, and led to such desperate conclusions, as we could not deliberately excuse. Yet, all our words must be given an account of at the day of judgment, and be produced as evidences of the frame of our hearts; and, probably, it will then appear, that the presumptuous cavils and objections of philosophic speculators, sprang from deeper enmity against God, and were more provoking to him, than the scandalous profligacy of the profane and licentious. Indeed, when we murmur under correction, do we not contend with God, and dictate to him how he ought to deal with us? But, can we seriously think that such weak and rebellious creatures have any right to be consulted, or are qualified to instruct, or authorized to reprove, the Almighty? We should therefore now judge ourselves on this account, "that we may not be judged of the Lord."—Every increasing discovery of the glorious perfections of God will proportionably humble us in the dust before him. One clear and distinct view of his holy majesty would appal the stoutest rebel upon earth; or even drive him to despair, if not tempered with discoveries of his mercy. How then will the wicked bear the blaze of his glory at the approaching day of wrath and judgment?—Even believers have but faint apprehensions of his glory; and if they saw it more clearly, their self-complacency, in disputing with each other, would be turned into self-abhorrence: their mouths would be stopped, or only opened to say, "Behold, I am vile!" The subjects of their controversies, their management of them, and their whole characters, would appear in another light; and they would impose silence upon themselves, not knowing what to answer, and aware of having already spoken far more than they can justify.—But when we see this glory of our God "in the face of Jesus Christ," we are humbled without being terrified; and our deepest reverence and self-abasement consist with filial confidence and love. When we clearly perceive how vile we are, we are ashamed and grieved for many of those words and actions, which before we vindicated: and when we truly repent, we retract what hath been improperly spoken, and sincerely purpose, and attempt, a change in our conduct and conversation.—The progressive renewal of a believer proceeds in the same way of conviction, humiliation, and watchfulness against remaining sin, as his first conversion did. If we have been much humbled before God, we need still deeper humiliation; if convinced of many evils in our conduct, we need convincing of many more; and every progressive step in this way makes us more and more sensible, that we, in no case, have either right or reason to complain. Even when we protest against ill-treatment from men, or vindicate ourselves from injurious charges, we are apt to reflect upon God; and to be so tenacious of our own right or reputation, as to neglect a proper regard to his honour; and we seem as if we would "disannul his judgment, and condemn him, that we may be righteous."

V. 9—24. The proud, stout, and profane words of sinners, might almost induce us to conclude, that they suppose themselves to have "an arm like God," and "can thunder with a voice like his!" yet they are exposed without the least defence to his almighty vengeance. Nor can words express their madness, in persisting in rebellion, and neglecting his invitations to be reconciled!—Alas! what is all the majesty, excellency, glory, or beauty, with which sinful worms can deck themselves? How impotent their rage! How vain their ostentation! The Lord alone can, and he certainly will, abase every one that is proud; either in true repentance, or as condemned criminals in destruction. And they who proudly trust, that their own right hand, their own contrivances, efforts, or merits, can save them, will be numbered among these enemies and rivals of God.—Our consideration of the power, and our dread of the rage, of the beasts of the field, might teach us the folly of resisting the will, or provoking the indignation of the Lord. Every haughty rebel should be reminded, that HE who made him, can make his sword to approach unto him; and not only to destroy his temporal life, but to fill his soul with unutterable anguish. Against HIM all power is vain, none can break through his snares, or outrave his vengeance; though they drink down iniquity like water, and still covet and thirst for more, and make no haste to flee from the wrath to come.—But, on the other hand, we may note, that it is well when the powerful are gentle and equitable, and love to see their inferiors secure, at liberty, and in comfort around them: and when, content with the provisions appointed for them, they do not injure, oppress, or defraud any one.—The all-bountiful Creator can supply our wants, however large; and he will do it, if we be content with what nature requires, and be not desirous of meat or drink for our lusts, but "seek first his kingdom and righteousness." (Notes, Matt. vi. 25—33.)—Happy are they, who trust in him, and leave him to manage all their concerns, who ordereth all things in heaven and earth, in perfect wisdom, justice, truth, and goodness.

NOTES.

CHAP. XLI. V. 1—11. It hath been much disputed what we are here to understand by Leviathan. Many interpret it of the crocodile: but the crocodile is an inhabitant of rivers, and leviathan of the sea. (Notes, iii. 2—10. Ps. lxxiv. 13—17. civ. 25, 26. Is. xxvii. 1.) Others suppose the whale to be meant; yet naturalists find many difficulties, in applying the particulars of the description to that creature. But there are several species of whales which are known, and probably others in different parts of the ocean, with which we have but little acquaintance; and there is some reason to think that the deep contains enormous creatures, comprehended under that general name, which are even larger than any which have yet been taken. (Note, xxvi. 5—13.) As "behemoth" seems to denote the largest of the quadrupeds, so, it is probable, "leviathan" means the largest of the inhabitants of the ocean. Moses especially mentions the creation of great whales; (Gen. i. 21:) and it is not likely that this animal, so particularly noted in the brief account of the creation, should be overlooked, when the Creator so copiously enumerated his works for the display of his own glory in them.—The Lord, in order more deeply to convince Job of his presumption in contending with him, demanded of him, whether he was able to master leviathan. Could he draw him out of the sea with a line and a hook, which might fasten through his tongue, nose, or jaws, after the various methods of taking other fishes?—Could he bring this prodigious animal to yield, and become his supplicant, to speak him fair and court his favour? Could he engage him in a covenant to be his servant, and to labour for him? Or could he tame and confine him for the amusement of his family? Would he and his acquaintance make a feast upon his flesh? Or, if it were unfit for that use, would he divide the oil and bones among the merchants?—Perhaps in the days of Job, it was not thought possible to take whales as they now do: but

23 The <sup>e</sup>flakes of his flesh <sup>f</sup>are joined together: they are firm in themselves; they cannot be moved.

24 His heart is as firm as a stone; yea, <sup>g</sup>as hard as a piece of the nether mill-stone.

25 When he raiseth up himself, the mighty are afraid; <sup>h</sup>by reason of breakings they purify themselves.

CHAP. XLII.

Job, in deep humility, submits to God, 1—6. God decides in Job's favour; and requires his three friends to present burnt-offerings for their sins, and submissively to engage Job to pray for them, 7, 8. They obey, and God accepts Job, 9. His prosperity is restored and doubled, 10—12. His children, 13—15. His age and death, 16, 17.

THEN Job answered the LORD, and said,
2 I know that <sup>a</sup>thou canst do every thing, and that <sup>b</sup>no thought <sup>c</sup>can be withholden from thee.

some of the species might have been cast on the shore, and divided for the use of different persons. It, however, served equally for Job's humiliation, if he supposed it impossible to take them, as if it really had been so.—He was therefore directed to consider, whether he was able to wound leviathan in his body, or head, with barbed irons, or fish-spears, and thus to take him? He was challenged to lay his hand on him if he dared: but should he attempt it, and escape with his life, he would remember his perilous situation so well, that he would not make another attempt. All hope of taking him would be vain; the very sight of him would daunt any man. None would dare to stir him up when asleep, or basking on the surface of the ocean; and who would dare to meet him when enraged? How could Job then expect to prevail on his almighty Creator to alter his plan of government to please him, or to use his power to serve his interests, or humour his wayward inclinations? For where was that man, who had first given to the Lord and made him his debtor, that he should have a right to demand payment; when all things in the whole universe were the work and property of God? (Notes, xxxv. 4—8. 1 Chr. xxix. 10—19. Rom. xi. 33—36.)

V. 12—34. The remainder of this chapter contains a particular, and most sublime, description of leviathan.—The Lord declared that he did not mean, by confining this prodigious animal in the vast ocean, to conceal from man “his parts, and power, and comely proportion:” for, though we call such creatures monsters, and deem them uncouthly, the Creator sees them to be formed in a suitable and becoming proportion of one part to another.—At first sight leviathan appears exceedingly formidable; and who can draw near to him, to examine particularly his whole skin, which serves as his garment, or to strip it off from him? Who would undertake to bridle him like a horse for his use? Or to look into his mouth; when a sight of his teeth would make any man dread immediate destruction. The scales, (or strong pieces of shields,) with which he is covered, as with an impenetrable coat of mail, are his confidence: by them he is secured, as if a seal fastened one part to another, so that no air can penetrate between them, no separation can be effected. When he “neeses,” or spouts the water into the air, his breath sparkles like fire, and his eyes appear like the morning-light; so that burning lamps and sparks, and smoke appear to be emitted from his mouth, as from under a furnace; and the flame, which attends his breath, seems as if it would set coals on fire. His head is joined to his body with the most surprising strength: and it is as if sorrow, or fainting, marched before him, exulting in the havoc which he makes of other creatures; or, however assaulted, his confidence in his own strength turns all his sorrows into joy. His muscles are immovably firm, and his heart as incapable of fear, or compassion, as if it were a mill-stone. When he appears above water, he causes such commotion and agitation in the waves, that the stoutest mariners are terrified, as in a furious storm; and betake themselves to confessions and prayers, expecting immediate death. (Notes, Ps. cvii. 23—30. Jon. i. 4—6. 11—16.) No weapons of war are of any avail; he is undaunted by them; they make no impression on him, or resistance to him; but he despises and derides them all. Indeed, he reclines his enormous weight upon the sharp-pointed stones, at the bottom of the sea, with as much ease as if he lay on the soft mire. His motion in the deep maketh the waters to move, as ointment in a pot over a vehement fire. His path may be tracked by this violent commotion, and by the white foam which he leaves upon the waters. In the whole earth there is no creature equal to him, being formed destitute of fear. He beholds every other animal, or the stately ships, and aspiring man, with contempt and disregard: he feels himself capable of ruling over the stoutest and proudest animals: and he hath more strength and courage, than the children of pride, who exalt themselves against their Maker.—It is undeniable, that some particulars in this description, do not accord to any species of whale, which is at present known; for none of them are covered with scales, or have an impenetrable skin: but it agrees still less with any other creature that we know; and especially it is wholly unsuited to the crocodile.—The ancient fathers generally understood the passage as an emblematic, or typical, description of Satan, that “king over all the children of pride.” (Notes, Is. xxvii. 1.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

Man was formed to be the lord of all other creatures here below: but his superiority consists principally in the powers of his rational nature, which, if duly improved, would teach him to submit to his Creator and to serve him; if therefore he irrationally forgets his place and duty; he should be reminded of his inferiority in other respects, even to many of the animals. Indeed, some of these are so powerful and formidable, that we are by no means able to cope with them: how mad then must the presumptuous transgressor be, who defies the power and wrath of the Almighty!—If such sublime language was proper in describing the terrible force of “leviathan;” what words can express the power of God's indignation, who is a “consuming fire!” He indeed beholdeth all high things, in order to abase them; he resists, and will crush, all those who proudly exalt themselves against him; and “who may stand in his sight when he is angry?” But he delights more in shewing his glory from the mercy-seat; and in encouraging sinners to take refuge “under the shadow of his wings,” and to prostrate themselves before him. If his anger be thus turned away from us, his omnipotence will be our protection; and then we need fear no enemy, though we shall have those which are far more formidable than leviathan. Satan, the king and father of all the children of pride, with his legions of evil spirits, is not confined to the ocean; nor can he be fenced out or resisted by our puny arm. Our wisdom, strength, and resolution are unavailing in this unequal contest; and far more useless than sword or spear against leviathan: all opposition or hope of overcoming, or escaping, if left to ourselves, would be in vain: his heart is stoned against compassion, and he hath been the cruel murderer of men, both body and soul, from the beginning: (Note, John viii. 41—47:.) he rejoices in causing destruction, and he looketh on all the proud and lofty of the earth as his own. But the poor in spirit, who humbly trust in the Lord's mercy, are safe: relying on their almighty assistant, they may defy and resist this tremendous foe, and be made more than conquerors over him. They must, however, remember, that they are saved wholly by grace: “For who hath prevented the LORD, that he should repay him?” And if they are mercifully rescued from the deserved wrath of God, and from the malice of Satan, they have no right to complain of any affliction or distress, or to boast of any wisdom, strength, or endowment of their own. Submission, dependence, and grateful obedience are their part: it behoves them to revere the Divine Majesty; to be abased under a consciousness of their own vileness; to take, and fill their allotted place; to cease from their own wisdom, and to give all the glory to their gracious God and Saviour.—When any man becomes proud of his personal strength and courage, let him be reminded of leviathan: when he is vain of his sagacity, ingenuity, or mental endowments, let him consider how much Satan excels him in them all. Let us all consider the holiness of our God, that we may be ashamed of our remaining unholiness: and, remembering from whom every good gift cometh, and for what end it was given, let us walk uprightly and humbly with the Lord; for, “before honour is humility.”

NOTES.

CHAP. XLII. V. 1—6. (Notes, xl. 3—5.) Job, borne down, as it were, with a torrent of light and conviction, at length answered; not in his own vindication, but with unreserved submission. He was fully assured, that the Lord could do every thing; and therefore it was madness to contend with him, and folly to despair of help from him. He knew that none of his impatient thoughts could be concealed from God: or, rather he meant, that the Lord could not be prevented from accomplishing every thing which he intended. (Marg. Notes, Prov. xix. 21. Is. xlvii. 10, 11. Dan. iv. 35—37. Eph. i. 9—12.) He had allowed these truths before, peevishly (Note, xxiii. 13—17;) but he now acknowledged them with humble acquiescence, and not without hope of relief.—In reproof of his presumption, God had said, “Who is this, that darkeneth counsel by words without knowledge?” (Notes, xxxviii. 1, 2.) And Job here, in indignant astonishment at his own presumption, repeats the sentiment, and pleads guilty to the charge, as if he had said, “Who indeed am I, a poor sinful worm, that I should venture to darken such deep subjects, by my ignorant and impatient discourses!” He confessed that he had spoken things beyond his knowledge, and too wonderful, or mysterious, for him to comprehend; and in a manner which merited the severest punishment.—God had likewise commanded Job to prepare his answer whilst he proposed some questions to him, and blamed him for presuming to instruct the Almighty; (Notes, xxxviii. 3. xl. 1, 2. 6—8;) but Job now humbly besought the Lord, that he would condescend to answer the questions which he desired to propose, solve those difficulties with which he was perplexed, declare his truth unto him, and become his instructor. He had indeed obtained some distant knowledge of God from education, instruction, and conference with his friends; and he had thought himself competent to discourse on such subjects; but the scene which

3 °Who is he that hideth counsel without knowledge? therefore have I uttered that I understood not; °things too wonderful for me, which I knew not.

4 °Hear, I beseech thee, and I will speak: °I will demand of thee, and declare thou unto me.

5 I have °heard of thee by the hearing of the ear; but now °mine eye seeth thee.

6 Wherefore °I abhor myself, and °repent in dust and ashes.

7 ¶ And it was so, that after the LORD had spoken these words unto Job, the LORD said to °Eliphaz the Temanite, °My wrath is kindled against thee, and against thy two friends: for °ye have not spoken of me the thing that is right, as my servant Job hath.

8 Therefore take unto you now °seven bullocks and seven rams, and °go to my servant Job, and °offer up for yourselves a burnt-offering, and °my servant Job shall pray for you; for °him will I accept: °lest I deal with you after your folly, in that ye have not spoken of me the thing which is right, like my servant Job.

9 ¶ So Eliphaz the Temanite, and Bildad the Shuhite, and Zophar the Naamathite, went, and °did according as the LORD commanded them: the LORD also accepted °Job.

10 And the LORD °turned the captivity of Job, °when he prayed for his friends: also °the LORD gave Job twice as much as he had before.

11 Then came there unto him °all his brethren, and all his sisters; and all they that had been of his acquaintance before, and did eat bread with him in his house: and °they bemoaned him, and comforted him over all the evil that the LORD had brought upon him: °every man also gave him a piece of money, and every one an ear-ring of gold.

12 °So the LORD blessed the latter end of Job more than his beginning: for °he had fourteen thousand sheep, and six thousand camels, and a thousand yoke of oxen, and a thousand she-asses.

13 ¶ He had also °seven sons and three daughters.

14 And he called the name of the first Jemima; and the name of the second, Kezia; and the name of the third, Keren-happuch.

15 ¶ And the LORD said to Job, °I have heard of thee, and thou art righteous and true. As thou hast said, °I will not put my hand against thee, and I will not diminish thee. Therefore shall I restore thee, and will multiply thee, and will make thee to be more than thou wast before. And thou shalt come to thy place, and thou shalt be more than thou wast before.

16 ¶ And Job answered the LORD, and said, °I have heard of thee, and thou art righteous and true. As thou hast said, °I will not put my hand against thee, and I will not diminish thee. Therefore shall I restore thee, and will multiply thee, and will make thee to be more than thou wast before.

17 ¶ And Job said, °I have heard of thee, and thou art righteous and true. As thou hast said, °I will not put my hand against thee, and I will not diminish thee. Therefore shall I restore thee, and will multiply thee, and will make thee to be more than thou wast before.

18 ¶ And Job said, °I have heard of thee, and thou art righteous and true. As thou hast said, °I will not put my hand against thee, and I will not diminish thee. Therefore shall I restore thee, and will multiply thee, and will make thee to be more than thou wast before.

19 ¶ And Job said, °I have heard of thee, and thou art righteous and true. As thou hast said, °I will not put my hand against thee, and I will not diminish thee. Therefore shall I restore thee, and will multiply thee, and will make thee to be more than thou wast before.

20 ¶ And Job said, °I have heard of thee, and thou art righteous and true. As thou hast said, °I will not put my hand against thee, and I will not diminish thee. Therefore shall I restore thee, and will multiply thee, and will make thee to be more than thou wast before.

21 ¶ And Job said, °I have heard of thee, and thou art righteous and true. As thou hast said, °I will not put my hand against thee, and I will not diminish thee. Therefore shall I restore thee, and will multiply thee, and will make thee to be more than thou wast before.

22 ¶ And Job said, °I have heard of thee, and thou art righteous and true. As thou hast said, °I will not put my hand against thee, and I will not diminish thee. Therefore shall I restore thee, and will multiply thee, and will make thee to be more than thou wast before.

23 ¶ And Job said, °I have heard of thee, and thou art righteous and true. As thou hast said, °I will not put my hand against thee, and I will not diminish thee. Therefore shall I restore thee, and will multiply thee, and will make thee to be more than thou wast before.

24 ¶ And Job said, °I have heard of thee, and thou art righteous and true. As thou hast said, °I will not put my hand against thee, and I will not diminish thee. Therefore shall I restore thee, and will multiply thee, and will make thee to be more than thou wast before.

25 ¶ And Job said, °I have heard of thee, and thou art righteous and true. As thou hast said, °I will not put my hand against thee, and I will not diminish thee. Therefore shall I restore thee, and will multiply thee, and will make thee to be more than thou wast before.

crave his instructions, and to be satisfied with the explanations, which he vouchsafes to give of those difficulties which intercept our path. For many hear of him, from parents and teachers, and learn to discourse of his works and ways, who have no heart-affecting influential views of his perfections. After all they have heard, he is to them an unknown God; for they do not so know him, as to reverence, love, trust, and to submit to him. (Notes, 1 Chr. xxviii. 9. John viii. 54—59. xvi. 1—3. xvii. 1—3. 25, 26. Acts xvii. 22—31. Rom. i. 21—23. 28—32.) Nay, believers, who have some experimental acquaintance with God, may even in this world, receive such clear discoveries of his glory, and experience so much of his power and love; that all which they knew before, shall seem as a mere report, compared with their present views. How then will it be, when we shall "see him as he is," and "know him as we are known?"—All true knowledge of God, proportionably humbles and abases us, and causes us to abhor ourselves, and repent in dust and ashes: but false doctrines and mere speculative knowledge puff men up, and feed their self-importance. By this criterion let us judge ourselves, and our knowledge in religion: let us take care not to be put off with empty notions, or to be satisfied with present measures of humiliation and experience: for when we are the most abased as sinners before God, we are in the readiest way of being exalted by him. Did such self-abasing language suit the lips of Job, that most eminent saint and servant of God, at the moment when every grace was in its fullest exercise; and can any language be too humiliating for us? If we start and scruple to say that we "abhor ourselves;" or if we find that we cannot do it with sincerity, does it not demonstrate, that we have never perceived so much of the Divine glory, as Job had, and therefore are not made so sensible of our own guilt and pollution? For it would be very arrogant for any of us to suppose ourselves better, by nature and practice, or more eminent in faith, patience, or piety, than this most approved and applauded character.

V. 7—17. When the Lord hath duly humbled and graciously pardoned his servants, he will clear their reputations, silence their slanderers, answer their confidence, and exceed their largest expectations; and he will also teach them, after his example, to forgive, love, and pray for those who have injured them. In this frame of spirit they will be prepared to bear honour in an unassuming manner, and then he will confer it. He generally first rebukes those whom he most loves: (Notes, v. 17. Heb. xii. 4—11. Rev. iii. 18, 19: ) but let not such, as for a time escape, be over confident, for their turn will soon come.—Even pious men may kindle the wrath of God against them, by not speaking humbly and honorably of him: but, as all his controversies with us begin by our sin, so every reconciliation must be effected, in that way which he hath revealed, and in the use of those means which he hath prescribed. They, who refuse to come in this way, shall be dealt with after their folly: but no true believer or real penitent will finally persist in such a refusal.—It is indeed very painful to be confuted, rebuked, and constrained to confess our mistakes and offences, and to beg the assistance and good offices of those, whom we have despised, condemned, and injured. Yet the true penitent will submit to all this, and more, when the will of God is known: his self-abasement will be proportioned to his former self-confidence; and whenever we approach God in his ordinances, such mutual concessions, restitutions, and forgivenesses, should first be attended to. (Marg. Ref. Note, Matt. v. 23, 24.) Nothing cements the affections of believers, who have jarred or disputed, so much as praying with and for each other: when they enjoy communion with their common Saviour, they feel a disposition to delight in "the communion of the saints;" and to forget all which for a season interrupted it: and "the effectual fervent prayer of a righteous man availeth much."—We should be careful not to judge anything before the time; we know not how the Lord may clear up one man's character, or expose another's; and therefore we should be candid towards others, and jealous of ourselves. Neither are we competent to decide who is the most happy man; for the end crowns the day. (Note, Ec. vii. 8.) When a man is oppressed, censured, and tempted, he appears very different from what he does when delivered and comforted: and he that is at ease, can scarcely conceive what effect sharp trials would have upon him.—Satan's prevalence is limited in duration, as well as in degree: and, when he is rebuked, the gloom of those whom he hath tempted will be dispelled, and way made for their returning consolations. (Notes, i. 9—12.) "When a man's ways please the Lord, he maketh even his enemies to be at peace with him." (Note, Prov. xvi. 7: ) he is graciously pleased with the very imperfect services of the humble believer; and when he has stood the trial, he shall come forth as gold purified from the furnace.—True religion mortifies the avarice which covets the wealth of other men, and that pride, which induces numbers to scorn the needful, well meant, and proper assistance which is offered to them. (Note, Phil. iv. 10—13.)—Whether the Lord gives us health, long life, affluence, friends, and flourishing families, or not, we shall eventually be happy, if we patiently suffer according to his will: and those things, which once we thought were altogether against us, shall, at length, appear to have been wisely chosen for our greater and more enduring good. (Note, James, i. 12.)—We know not for what good purposes our lives may be prolonged; and therefore should not be impatient for death, even when greatly afflicted. And whether our children and friends go before, or follow us into the eternal world, they will not be lost to us, if the Lord hath made them partakers of his grace: this, above all things we should seek, for an inheritance for them and for ourselves, being infinitely more valuable than all the wealth and personal accomplishments in the world. But though Job's trials and their happy event are replete with instruction and consolation, to the suffering tempted believer: yet we shall be still more edified and encouraged by looking unto Jesus. His abasements, temptations and sufferings were vastly greater than those of Job; and he endured them with perfect patience, and they issued far more gloriously. For us he was tempted, and suffered, and emerged, and triumphed, and is glorified: for us when we were enemies, he offered himself a sacrifice, and now for us he pleads before the throne.—In him believers are pardoned and accepted: "He sees his seed, and prolongs his days, and the pleasure of the Lord prospers in his hands:" but there is no salvation in any other. (Note Is. liii. 10—12.) To him we must come, in him we must confide, to him we must submit, and from him receive all that we can want: but we can give him nothing, except the honour of our whole salvation, and ourselves to be, by his grace, his redeemed and devoted servants. May we then experience his grace, share his victories, tread in his steps, and copy his patience; and we shall find in the event, "that the Lord is pitiful, and of tender mercy." But we have need of patience, that after having done the will of God, we may receive the promise.

THE BOOK OF P S A L M S.

The Hebrew name of this book is Tehillim, or Praises; because the praises of God form its grand scope and object, to which all other subjects contained in it are, in one way or another, rendered subservient.—The word Psalms is taken from the Greek, and denotes that these sacred hymns were, when sung, accompanied with the psaltery, harp, or lute: and indeed, from the time of David, psalmody, with various kinds of instrumental music, formed a considerable part of the daily worship at the sanctuary. (Notes, 1 Chr. ix. 33. xv. 16—22. xvi. 4—6. 37—46. xxv.)—The whole collection is often called, ‘The Psalms of David.’ He indeed was, undoubtedly, the writer of the greatest part of them: his name is prefixed to above seventy Psalms: and he certainly wrote some, and probably many, of those which are not expressly ascribed to him: concerning others, it remains doubtful who composed them; but one is entitled ‘The Prayer of Moses, the Man of God:’ (xc:) and there is internal proof that some were written long after the time of David, and even during, or subsequent to, the Babylonish captivity. David, however, was the first who especially employed his poetical talents, by the guidance of the Holy Spirit, in composing sacred poems, and who established or regulated the psalmody at the sanctuary, was warranted to call himself ‘the sweet Psalmist of Israel:’ and to add, ‘the Spirit of the Lord spake by me, and his word was on my tongue.’ (Notes, 2 Sam. xxiii. 1—4.)—Josephus informs us, that the Levites were enjoined to preserve at the temple, all such hymns as might be composed in honour of God: and it is thought by some learned men, that the book of Psalms which we now have, was selected from a much larger number, as divinely inspired, and so, admissible into the canon of Scripture; while many others were rejected, as not intitled to this honourable distinction. However this may be, the entire book has certainly been considered as a part of ‘the oracles of God’ in every age, by an invariable testimony. St. Paul quotes the second Psalm expressly as a prophecy of Christ, (Acts xiii. 33;) which implies that the Psalms were arranged after the same order, in general, as they now are. Nearly fifty of the Psalms are quoted, or referred to, in the New Testament. Our Lord, proposing a question to the Scribes concerning the Messiah, introduces a passage from the hundred and tenth Psalm, in this manner, ‘David himself said by the Holy Ghost,’ or, ‘David in Spirit calls him Lord:’ and when instructing his disciples, after his resurrection, he says, ‘All things must be fulfilled, which are written in the law of Moses, and in the Prophets, and in the Psalms, concerning me.’ (Notes, Matt. xxii. 41—46. Mark xii. 35—37. Luke xxiv. 44—49.) In like manner, the apostle Paul, quoting a passage from the ninety-fifth Psalm, which he ascribes to David, uses this language, ‘Wherefore, as the Holy Ghost saith, To-day, if ye will hear his voice:’ (Notes, Acts iv. 23—28. Heb. iii. 7—13. iv. 3—11;) and the assembled Christian church applies the second Psalm to Christ, in these words—‘Lord, thou art God, who by the mouth of thy servant David hast said.’ In so decided a manner is the divine inspiration of the Old Testament attested by Christ and his apostles.—The Jewish writers indeed are unwilling to bestow on David the title of prophet, and ascribe to him only a subordinate kind of inspiration; according to the several distinctions which they have devised in this respect: but St. Peter expressly calls him a prophet; (Note, Acts ii. 33—36;) and the number and clearness of the predictions which he delivered, and which were evidently fulfilled after many ages, most fully prove him entitled to that character. Indeed, the several particulars respecting the descent, kingdom, and priesthood of Christ, the contempt and persecutions which he endured, and the intenseness and variety of his sufferings, the manner of his death, his resurrection, ascension, and glory, with the success of his gospel, and the calling of the Gentiles, are so circumstantially foretold in one or other of the Psalms; that a history of these events might in a great measure be compiled from them; and in some cases, with a minuteness to which historians seldom descend.—The words which our Lord used on the cross, in two instances, were taken from the Psalms; and the insulting language of his prosecutors was the very same which David, above a thousand years before, had put into their mouths. (Notes, Ps. xxii. 1. 7, 8. xxxi. 5. Matt. xxvii. 39—46. Luke xxiii. 46.)—Many Psalms indeed, are, directly and throughout, prophecies of Christ; various passages in others must be interpreted of him: and David was so eminent a type of the Saviour, that his very name, in some instances in the prophecies, is given to this his most illustrious descendant. (Notes, Is. lv. 1—5. Ez. xxiv. 23—31. xxxvii. 25. Hos. iii. 4, 5.) But, besides this, that union, which subsists betwixt the Redeemer and his people, and the conformity thence resulting, are of such a nature, that it is impossible but the same things should apply in many respects to both: though a discrimination must needs be observed in others. This may lead us to an obvious decision of the controversy, which has often been agitated; whether all the Psalms should be applied to Christ or not. No doubt every pious mind will allow, that each of them either immediately points to him in his person, character, and offices; or may be so applied as to lead the believer’s thoughts to Him, who is the centre of all acceptable religion: and, probably, there are few persons, who suppose that all the Psalms speak of Christ in exactly the same manner; but rather according to the nature of the subject. It cannot indeed be doubted, but that the Psalms in general are devotional and experimental, the language of the gracious heart under its various exercises; whether mourning for sin, thirsting after God, or rejoicing in him; whether burdened with affliction, struggling with temptation, or triumphing in the hope or enjoyment of deliverance; whether admiring the Divine perfections, thanking God for his mercies, meditating on his truths, or delighting in his service. They are in great measure a divinely appointed standard of genuine experience; by which we may judge whether, or how far, our own desires, aims, fears, hopes, joys, and sorrows are spiritual; and how far they are carnal, or verge to enthusiasm or delusion. The value of the Psalms in this particular is inestimable; and the more cordially we can enter into the views, and appropriate the language of the Psalmist, the higher is our progress in genuine religion. ‘The Psalms are an epitome of the Bible, adapted to the purposes of devotion. They treat occasionally of the creation and formation of the world, the dispensations of providence, and the economy of grace; the transactions of the patriarchs; the exodus of the children of Israel, their journey through the wilderness, and settlement in Canaan; their law, priesthood, and ritual; the exploits of their great men, wrought by faith; their sins and captivities; their repentance and restoration; the sufferings and victories of David; the peaceful and happy reign of Solomon; the advent of Messiah, with its effects and consequences; his incarnation, birth, life, passion, death, resurrection, ascension, kingdom, and priesthood; the effusion of the Spirit, the conversion of the nations; the rejection of the Jews; the establishment, increase, and perpetuity of the Christian church; the end of the world; the general judgment, the condemnation of the wicked, and the final triumph of the righteous with their Lord and King. These are the subjects here presented to our meditation.—They are adorned with the figures and set off with the graces of poetry: and poetry itself is designed yet further to be recommended by the charms of music, thus consecrated to the service of God: that so, delight may prepare the way for improvement, and pleasure become the handmaid of wisdom; while every turbulent passion is calmed by sacred melody, and the evil spirit is still dispossessed by the harp of the son of Jesse.—They present religion to us in its most engaging dress, communicating truths, which philosophy could never investigate, in a style which poetry can never equal: while history is made the vehicle of prophecy, and creation lends all its charms to paint the glories of redemption.—Besides their incomparable fitness to express our sentiments, they are at the same time memorials of, and appeals to, former mercies and deliverances—they are acknowledgments of prophecies accomplished.’ (Bp. Horne’s Preface to the Psalms.) In commenting therefore upon this book, we should continually keep the Saviour in our mind: and whilst we consider who he was, and what he did; how and why he suffered, and how he rose and reigns; we should also endeavour to learn what his true disciples are, what they ought to be, and what they actually do aspire after. The literal meaning, as far as the Psalmist is concerned, should be adverted to, where it can be ascertained; the particulars, in which Christ is predicted or typified, noted; and the use that is to be made of every part of each Psalm to encourage the faith and hope, to direct the temper and conduct, to enliven the devotions, and to assist the self-examination of the reader, should be plainly shewn.—We are also here continually reminded of what we must have to struggle against, from within and from without, and how we may succeed in this conflict: and solemn warnings, and denunciations of vengeance against oppressors and persecutors, and the despisers and opposers of Christ and his gospel, are every where interspersed. This indeed has been considered as an objection to the use of the Psalms, in public or private devotion: and a prejudice has arisen in some pious minds against several parts of them, as if contrary to the Christian spirit; but, doubtless, the right spirit has always been the same; and these parts must be considered, either as direct prophecies, or as divinely inspired declarations of the certain doom awaiting all the opposers of Christ, and his cause or people; and not as expressions of private resentment, or malevolence against injurious individuals. In short, there is nothing in true religion, doctrinal, experimental, and practical, but will present itself to our attention, whilst we meditate upon the Psalms. Scarcely any part of the book, but, when properly understood and accommodated, suits the case of private Christians, and may be usefully employed in public worship: hardly an occasion of praise and thanksgiving can be conceived, to which some portion of them, faithfully rendered in poetical versions, may not be applied with peculiar energy and propriety; and indeed the Christian’s use of them in the closet, and the minister’s in the pulpit, will generally increase, with their growing experience of the power of true religion in their own hearts. From this eulogium on this part of Scripture, let the reader be excited to meditate on it carefully for himself: but let him not expect too much from the expositor. Brevity must be consulted; a writer’s inclination may exceed his ability; and at the last, the teaching Spirit of God, sought in fervent prayer, leading the pious soul into the genuine exercise of faith, hope, love, and gratitude, will do more to enable a man to enter into the Psalmist’s views, than any human explication. If the author is enabled to suggest a few profitable hints upon each Psalm, he shall have cause to be very thankful.

Various divisions of this book have been made, apparently without much reason. The present order seems to have been very ancient; though by no means coincident with the date of the several Psalms, which, indeed, have seldom much connexion with each other.—The Septuagint throw the ninth and tenth Psalms into one, as also the hundred and fourteenth and the hundred and fifteenth; and they divide the hundred and sixteenth and the hundred and forty-seventh each into two.—Various other particulars respecting the titles, the dates, and the occasions of the several Psalms, will be noted as we proceed.—‘The version of the Psalms, in our Bible, which was made by the translators employed by James the First, is posterior to that printed in our prayer-books, which was executed in 1539. This last, as very excellent, and familiarized by custom, was retained in the Liturgy; though, as translated chiefly from the Septuagint, it does not so exactly correspond with the original, as does that in our Bibles.’ (Grey’s Key.) It may be added, that the Prayer-book translation is in no respect comparable to that of the Bible.

NOTES.

PSALM I. V. 1—3. This psalm is generally considered as a preface to the book, and supposed to have been prefixed to it by Ezra. (Notes, Ezra. vii. 6—10. Neh. viii. 1, 2.) It establishes the important distinction betwixt the righteous and the wicked; and assures us of the felicities of the former, and the misery of the latter.—All men shun misery, and aim to be happy: but few understand that misery springs from sin, and that happiness can be enjoyed only in the favour of God. This the Scriptures declare; and by this light the believer seeks and finds it. In such portions of the word of God, we ought not to look for the way, in which sinners are made righteous; or, the origin of that difference which subsists among men, who are all of one nature: for they only inform us of the character of such as are accepted by God, and are in the way to heaven. (Notes, xv. 1. P. O. xxiv. 3—6. Rom. ii. 7—11.)—The translation in our prayer-book, renders this in the past tense; and though the original might very well bear that meaning, yet the context and the whole tenor of Scripture shew, that this cannot be the exclusive sense; for that would imply, that they alone are blessed, who never have walked in the counsel of the ungodly, nor stood in the way of sinners, nor sat in the seat of the scornful: whereas penitent believers, whatever their previous character has been, are partakers of the blessings, which is evidenced by their subsequent conduct: and none but they answer this description. (Notes, xxxii. 1. 2. cvi. 3—6. cxix. 1—5. Matt. v. 1—12. Luke xi. 27, 28. Rom. iv. 6—8.)—“The ungodly” are those, however moral or virtuous, who profanely despise spiritual blessings, and live without any due regard to God and religion, as all unconverted men do.—“The counsel of the ungodly” signifies, the maxims and principles of worldly men, who form their plans and calculate advantages or disadvantages, according to their several pursuits, without bringing the favour or displeasure of God, or eternal things, into the account: and “walking in this counsel” signifies an habitual conduct formed on such principles, and regulated according to such rules. “Sinners,” in this climax, seems to mean, those who add to their ungodliness, gross immoralities, and such crimes as natural conscience and the opinion of the world protest against. (Notes, Luke vii. 37—39. John ix. 24—34. Rom. v. 6—10.) And to “stand in the way of sinners,” implies, the habit of vices gradually overcoming the sense of shame and remorse of conscience; till a quiet, rarely interrupted by convictions, is superinduced. Yet these occasional convictions are the source of uneasiness; and this prepares the sinner for “sitting down in the seat of the scornful.”—“The scornful” no doubt, are such, as encourage themselves and each other in ungodliness and wickedness, by infidel and atheistical tenets; and as have recourse to corrupt principles, to bear them out in corrupt practices; and so are given up to a blinded and deluded mind, as a punishment of their conduct in following the impulse of a wicked heart. And to “sit in the seat of the scornful,” is to become teachers and apostles of infidelity, and impiously to ridicule, with all the genius, wit, and sense, which they possess, the doctrines, precepts, and worshippers of God. (Notes, Prov. i. 21—23. iii. 34. xiv. 6. Is. xlviii. 14, 15. 2 Pet. iii. 1—4.)—The Septuagint translate the last clause, the seat of pestilences, (Acts xxiv. 5. Murg.) Thus “the simple ones love simplicity, and fools hate knowledge, and scorners delight in their scorning.”—But the happy persons here described, have been preserved, or recovered, from these dreadful evils. They have, by divine grace, separated from all ungodly companions, and lost their relish for the vain pleasures of the world; they have learned to delight in the word of God, and to meditate continually upon it. This engages their affections, and occupies that time, and those thoughts, which others waste in vanity or sloth: thus they become like a tree planted in a well-watered soil, which seasonably brings forth fruit, and abides verdant and flourishing; and whilst they are rendered steadfast and joyful in hope, and fruitful in holiness, they are made useful to others, and eventually prosper in the best desires and purposes of their heart. (Notes, Josh. i. 8. Jer. xvii. 5—8.)

V. 4—6. The psalmist, having briefly stated the character and felicity of the righteous, contrasts with these the worthlessness and misery of the ungodly, however distinguished: comprising all, who are not accepted worshippers of God. These are not only as unfruitful and withered trees, but despicable and useless as the chaff; they are readily driven from one delusion to another; and shall soon be torn away from all their worldly prosperity, and cast into hopeless misery. However their success may now be envied, or their character mistaken, the judgment of God will infallibly separate them from the congregation of the righteous. (Notes, Job xx. 4—29. xxvii. 7—23. Is. xxix. 5, 6. Hes. xlii. 3, 4. Mai. iii. 16—18. Matt. iii. 11, 12.) For the Lord hath appointed, and he approves, the way in which the righteous walk; he knows all its snares, dangers, and difficulties, and will watch over all who walk in it: but he leaves the wicked to the consequences of that way which they choose; and it leads directly to the pit of destruction. (Note, xxxvii. 18, 19. Prov. iv. 18, 19. Nah. i. 7, 8. 2 Tim. ii. 19.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The tendency of corrupt nature is from bad to worse. Men first forget and neglect God and his worship, and act from worldly maxims and principles; then they often venture on gross and scandalous crimes; and at length they frequently settle in infidelity, or an impious contempt of religion, and become the avowed and determined enemies of its doctrines and precepts. None know, when they first shake off the impressions of a religious education, or venture to neglect known duty, how far they may be left to proceed: when inward and outward restraints are surmounted, they may rush downward into impiety and iniquity with accelerated force, as the stone falls to the earth. We ought to be thankful if we have been preserved from these dreadful enormities, and have not been left to “sit down” finally “in the seat of the scornful.” And young persons should be warned not to venture aside into a path which leads to such fatal consequences: for numbers are left to wander from God, to be hardened in sin, and finally to perish. But blessed be God for the covenant of grace, and Jesus the Mediator of it: by his perfect obedience even unto death, he is become “the end of the law for righteousness to every one that believeth.” Whenever the sinner becomes sensible of his guilt and misery, he may return by Christ, the living way, and join the company of the righteous. In the exercise of repentance and faith, he separates from the society of the ungodly, in which he can no longer delight. He cannot now act according to their maxims, or conform to their fashions, join in their pleasures, or relish their profane scoffs and jests. Perceiving the vanity of the world and the odiousness of sin, he begins to delight in the word of God, which shews him the preciousness of Christ, and the beauty of holiness. Reading, and meditating daily on the sacred Scriptures, with faith and prayer, he becomes “in Christ a new creature:” he has now new desires, pleasures, hopes, fears, sorrows, companions, and employments: his thoughts, words, and actions are changed: he enters upon a new state and bears a new character. (Notes, Deut. vi. 6—9. cxix. 97—100. 2 Tim. iii. 14—17.) “Behold, all things are become new!” and the word of God is the support, comfort, and rule of his new and heavenly life. This man's religion does not consist in notions or forms; but in due season he will bring forth the substantial fruits of righteousness: for he is planted and takes root in a good soil; and, through the word, derives from Christ those communications of divine grace, which gradually transform his soul into the Redeemer's image. Nor will his profession end in apostasy: for his Saviour lives, and he shall live also; and though he may be tried and often disappointed, yet he shall find at last, that he had all profitable success in each of his undertakings.—How different the character, prospect, and end of the ungodly! Their doom will be as dreadful, as their characters were worthless; for, being “vessels of wrath fitted for destruction,” they will be driven from the presence of the Lord into unquenchable fire. They may indeed here impose upon their fellow-creatures, as well as deceive themselves: but the Judge will perfectly and finally separate them from the righteous; and will send them away into everlasting punishment, while he receives his people into life eternal. (Notes, Matt. xxv. 31—46.) If we would then be happy, we must choose the way which the Lord knows and approves, though it be unfashionable, and despised: we must come out and be separate from the wicked: we must learn to redeem our time for the study of the Scriptures and attendance on God's ordinances; we must examine whether we can and do delight in these sacred exercises, and in any measure become fruitful in holiness. And if we meet with troubles by the way, we should keep the end in view: for surely we can never envy those, however prosperous or admired, who throng that broad road which leads to destruction. (Note, Matt. vii. 14, 15.)

PSALM II. V. 1—3. The occasion of this psalm might be taken from David's advancement to the throne, and his expectation of triumphing over the opposition made to his authority, both by disaffected Israelites and the surrounding nations; (Notes, 2 Sam. ii. 4. 9. v.) but it is throughout an

PSALM III.

David, amidst numerous insulting foes, firmly relies on the divine protection, 1-6. He prays for deliverance, and ascribes salvation to the Lord, 7, 8.

evident prophecy of Christ, and repeatedly quoted as such in the New Testament; where it is ascribed to David, though his name is not prefixed to it. (Acts, iv. 25-28. xiii. 33.) The Jews and Gentiles, the rulers, and the people, set themselves to oppose Christ; when he was condemned by the Jewish council, and crucified by the Roman authority, amidst the insults of surrounding multitudes. (Notes, Matt. xxvii. 1. 2. 11-18. 27-44.) After his resurrection the same opposition was made to the establishment of his religion; and in every age, in one form or another, his kingdom has generally been opposed by the rulers of this world. But the event has uniformly proved, that this attempt, however sagaciously planned, or vigorously conducted, was "a vain thing," an ineffectual and ruinous contest against omnipotence; which originated from a rooted enmity to the authority and commandments of God, and the restraints which they impose on the self-will and corrupt passions of mankind.

V. 4-6. The almighty Sovereign, being fully aware of the intentions of his combined enemies, and able to disconcert them in a moment, disdained their impotent rage; as men deride and laugh at those, who would, but cannot, hurt them; yet, at the same time their enmity excited his indignant wrath; and by his powerful word he determined to confound and destroy them; whilst he would establish his King, the Messiah, or Anointed, (Murg. 6.) upon his throne, and in his authority over his holy church; of which the temple and its worship, and the kingdom of the house of David, upon mount Zion, were types.—Accordingly, when the priests and rulers prevailed on Pilate to crucify their anointed King, they eventually forwarded his exaltation; and their persecution of his disciples drove numbers into remote regions, and thus greatly promoted the promulgation of the gospel. (Notes, Gen. iii. 14, 15. John xi. 47-53. Acts viii. 4.)—After a time, the Roman legions, the executioners of Divine vengeance, surrounded Jerusalem; and at length destroyed the city and temple, and subverted both their civil and ecclesiastical state, with the most unheard-of miseries and destruction of the devoted Jews; the wretched remains of whom to this day, scattered throughout the nations, unwillingly attest the fulfilment of this ancient prophecy. The Roman empire too, having set itself against the cause of Christ, began directly to decline, and at length sunk in the unequal contest. (Note, Zech. xiv. 1-3.) The emperor Julian, also an apostate from Christianity, having undertaken to rebuild the temple and restore the Jews, was strangely baffled, and soon came to an untimely end; while the kingdom of Christ continues to this present time, in contempt and defiance of all the machinations of earth and hell.—The Septuagint render the sixth verse as the words of David or of Christ: 'But I have been constituted king by him,' &c.

V. 7-9. The king himself is here introduced, proclaiming the eternal purpose of the Father respecting his mediatorial authority, which was to be the recompense of his propitiatory sufferings. At his resurrection from the dead, he was declared to be the Son of God. (Note, Rom. i. 1-4.) His sonship in this place seems mentioned as coeval with the decree, which is grounded upon it—"Thou art my Son," &c. therefore I make the decree of which, in due time, this declaration shall be published. Christ is here recognized as the begotten of the Father, and as really partaker of the divine nature of him who begat him. (Note, John i. 18.) When he had accomplished his work on earth, he was authorized to ask and receive the heathen for his inheritance. For his mediatorial authority extends throughout the earth, for the benefit of his church; and all who are not made his willing subjects, will be as easily and entirely destroyed by his power, as a potter's vessel is broken by the stroke of an iron rod.—The divine appointment of David to be king of Israel, the special favour shewn him, the victories that he obtained, and the dominion which he exercised over the surrounding nations, were very faint shadows of the intended events.

V. 10-12. It would be vain to oppose the unalterable decree of God, that his Son should reign over the whole earth. It was therefore the wisdom of kings and rulers to submit; to fear the wrath, and reverence the majesty of JEHOVAH, and become his servants; to rejoice in their superior rank and prosperity with trembling, lest these should subject them to more aggravated vengeance; to do homage to Christ as their superior Lord, from whom they have their authority; to adore him as their God; and to welcome him as their Saviour, by the kiss of reverence, submission, love, and adoration. (Notes, 1 Sam. x. 1. 1 Kings xix. 18. Hos. xiii. 1. 2.) Otherwise they must perish in their rebellion, far from the way of life; for even those, who provoked this almighty King, by rejecting his authority, though without any circumstances of peculiar aggravation, would experience the terrible effects of his wrath; but all who put their trust in him, as their Saviour, would share the blessings of his righteous and merciful government.—The evident fulfilment of the unequivocal predictions in this psalm, by a series of events exactly answerable to them, during the lapse of many ages, is in reality a full demonstration, that both the prophecy and the accomplishment were from God; and that our holy religion is of divine original and authority. The Jews themselves attest that this psalm was extant many ages before the birth of Jesus; and many of them allow, that it principally relates to the promised Messiah, whom they are yet vainly expecting! And can any one be so absurdly sceptical as to imagine that human sagacity, or mere conjecture, could have suggested explicit predictions, which should at length be verified in the most exact and circumstantial manner; by events, no otherwise to be accounted for, than on scriptural principles, and by allowing them to have been effected by the power of God himself?

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

As this apostate world is in fact the kingdom of Satan, unconverted men of every rank, party, or character, may be excited by him, to concur in opposing the cause of God, and the kingdom of Christ. But the kings and the rulers of the earth have generally been especially instigated, by the slanders and misrepresentations of false teachers, and other interested persons, as well as by their own prejudices and passions, to combine in this opposition. They do not brook submission to a superior; the humbling truths and spiritual precepts of Christ run counter to their ambitious projects and worldly lusts: and they are apt to suppose that this authority is inconsistent with their dignity, or their felicity. Thus they are often excited to employ all their power and policy "against the LORD and against his anointed;" whilst they deceive themselves with the idea, that they are only opposing some obstinate sectaries, who refuse submission to their edicts. (Notes, John xvi. 1-3. Acts ix. 3-6. xxvi. 9-11.) But these are vain imaginations, which the Lord disdains and abhors; and can effect nothing but the confusion and ruin of those who indulge them. For Jesus, the eternal Son of God, is established, and shall reign upon his holy throne, as the Saviour of his people, and the avenger of his enemies. The decree of the Father has taken effect in part: the kingdom of the Mediator is fixed on the ruins of Jewish and heathen opposers; and it shall at length universally prevail, whilst every enemy shall be dashed in pieces by his iron rod. (Note, Rev. ii. 24-28.) He was indeed crucified in apparent weakness; but he arose in power, and hath asked and received his kingdom over all things for the benefit of his church. Let then kings and rulers, as well as their subjects, lay down their arms, submit to his authority, trust in him as their Saviour, and worship him as their Lord and God; and use all their influence, as his servants, to promote his cause, and advance his kingdom. Indeed, we should "rejoice with trembling" in all outward distinctions and possessions, lest the abuse of them should enhance our condemnation; and even in our attempts to serve the Lord, we sinners have need to fear and tremble, lest we come short of his acceptance; but if we have submitted to the Saviour, and come to the Father in his name and merits, we may rejoice in him with reverence, but without consternation. For "he casteth out none who come to him," however sinful they may have been; but they shall all be blessed for ever: whilst all who oppose, despise, neglect, or abuse his gospel, and will not have him for their Saviour and their King, will incur his indignation; the effects of which, even when kindled but a little, will be too dreadful for words to express or imagination to conceive.

PSALM III. Title. These titles are found in the Hebrew, though it is said, that several of them are wanting in some manuscripts. They seem, however, in general to belong to the psalms to which they are prefixed, and to be of the same authority with them. In this and other instances, they are useful in fixing the interpretation: but often their meaning is to us doubtful or difficult. (Notes, &c. 2 Sam. xv.-xviii.)

PSALM IV. Title. The "chief musician," or overseer, or president, seems to have been the person appointed in the psalmody of the sanctuary, to set the tune and lead the singers and musicians. (Notes, 1 Chr. vi. 33. xv. 22. xxv. 1—8.) "Neginoth," may either mean the instruments with which the psalm was to be sung, or the tune to which it was set. Perhaps this psalm was composed on the same occasion as the foregoing. (Title, iii.)

V. 1. Of my, &c. By this expression, the psalmist acknowledged God to be, in all respects, the author and source of his righteousness, as accepted and sanctified; and he appealed to him to do justice betwixt him and his unrighteous adversaries. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 2. My glory, &c. David might have considered his throne as a special honour to him, seeing he was called to it by the immediate choice of God, and as a type of the Messiah : but the Lord himself, and his relation to him, were indeed "his glory." His enemies derided him for this, and wanted to make him ashamed of it, turned it into a reproach to him : while the vain grounds of confidence, in which they delighted, were deceiving them ; and while they invented lies to make him odious.—“Ye will love vanity: ye will seek a lie.”

V. 3—5. The piety of David evinced, that he was the object of the Lord's special choice and favour, who, having advanced him to the throne, as "the man after his own heart," would certainly establish his kingdom. Of this he solemnly reminded them: and exhorted them to take heed what they did; to repent of their sins, to examine their own hearts, to hearken to the voice of conscience, to court retirement, to pause and reflect on their conduct; to bring the appointed sacrifices, with repentance, faith, and piety; and thus to cast themselves upon the mercy of God, for forgiveness and salvation.—The Septuagint translate the clause here rendered, “Stand in awe, and sin not.” Be angry, and sin not, which St. Paul seems to have quoted from that version, Phil.

original word signifies, to put into vehement commotion.—Godly. (3) The original implies also equity, or mercy.

He could ask the Lord to smile on him as a kind father, and to shine on him as a sun; and this had often before made, and even now did make, him happier, than the greatest confluence of worldly goods could render the ungodly. (Marr. Ref.) Thus comforted, he indeed pined, but he neither envied nor

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The servants of God, whose "righteousness is of Him," will have increasing experience of his faithfulness, power, and love: having been frequently enlarged when distressed in their souls, or in their circumstances, they call upon him with confidence; and they neither have nor desire any other plea, than that of his free mercy. The Lord alloweth them to glory and rejoice in him; nor shall the sons of men ever render them ashamed of their confidence: but all else is vain and fallacious, and the conduct of ungodly men is a mixture of hypocrisy, deceit, flattery, and slander. In proportion as we are conscious of devotedness to God, we have evidence that we are chosen and "set apart by him," to shew forth his praises and enjoy his love: nor can we ask more than he is ready to grant. Instead of reviling our slanderers, we should then warn them and expostulate with them, and invite them to seek a share in our happiness. This the vilest sinners may hope for, when convinced of their guilt and danger, and afraid to sin any more; when they begin to examine their hearts, and to confess their sins; and when they seek opportunities of solitude and silent meditation.—In every thing we ought to use means, and attend to the ordinances and commandments of God: but after all, we must place our whole dependence on his mercy and grace.—Let worldly men know, that the true Christian has found that good, which they are in vain inquiring after; whilst he enjoys peace and communion with God, he envies not their wealth or indulgence; and as he goes to rest at night in confidence of Divine protection, so he can look forward to the grave, as the bed, in which he shall rest, till the joyful morning of the resurrection. But, as this salvation is in Christ alone, where amazed to hear of the numbers who followed the unnatural rebellion of Absalom; and especially that many whom he had favoured and trusted, had joined that party. (Notes, 2 Sam. xv. 12—15. 30.) He also was astonished at the insolence and impiety of enemies, and that they should interpret his troubles as evidences that God had rejected him, and either could not or would not help him. (Notes, xlii. 1.—3. 9, 10. lxxi. 10, 11. 2 Sam. xvi. 5—15.)—The meaning of the word “Selah,” which occurs three times in this psalm, and frequently in others, and also in the prophecy of Habakkuk, is not fully ascertained by expositors. Some entirely omit it: but this may be thought taking an unwarrantable liberty with Scripture; others suppose it to be merely a musical term, and the Septuagint seem to have thus understood it. (Διὰ ψαλμοῦ, a change of song, or melody.) In general, however, it appears to be used as a call on him who read or sang, to pause and reflect; as something peculiarly important or surprising had been mentioned. ‘Selah here signifies a lifting up of the voice, to cause us to consider the sentence, as a thing of great importance.’ (Marginal Notes to Barker’s Bible.)

V. 3.—Instead of despairing of help and salvation from God, the afflicted psalmist considered him as “a shield” around him, yea, as his glory. (Notes, iv. 2. lxxxiv. 11, 12. 2 Sam. xxii. 2, 3.) He had often called on God in trouble and danger, on former occasions, and had been heard: and having now, as in many former instances, committed himself to the Divine protection by faith and prayer; he was enabled to sleep with as much composure as if he had been in perfect peace; and accordingly he was supported, and protected from all injury. (Note, iv. 6—8.)

V. 6—8. (Notes, xxvii. 1—3. 2 Sam. xviii. 5.) The Lord had helped David, and disabled his enemies, when persecuted by Saul and his wogodly adherents; and he was confident that he would thus appear for him in his present distress; for salvation, temporal and spiritual, came from God alone: and he never failed to bless his faithful people. (Notes, lxxi. 16—18. cxv. 9—13. cxviii. 1—12.)

The most excellent and eminent persons must expect opposition and ill usage; and they should prepare for ingratitude and contempt, as the recompense of their labours for the good of others. The number and power of their adversaries may become very formidable; and they may be astonished to find among them, such as they have most depended on: nay, their very confidence in God will often be derided, as delusion, or presumption. Yet he is a "shield" to all those that trust in him; they count their relation to him their "glory," in preference to all dignities or achievements; and in all dangers they continue to hope that he will yet lift up their head above all their enemies. Indeed, all true Christians should avow their confidence in God, and their expectation from him, in seasons of distress; and be open as well as fervent in their prayers unto him, upon his mercy-seat in his holy temple. Thus they will enjoy safety, and inward peace, in the midst of enemies and the alarms of war: for the Lord will hear and sustain them; and what are ten thousands of armed foes, encamped against those whom the Omnipotent protecteth? (Notes, 2 Chron. xlii. 8. Rom. viii. 28—31.)—Past experience should encourage the hope of future answers to our prayers; we may even rejoice in the enmity of the ungodly, and desire that they may be deprived of their power to do mischief, but not that any further harm may befall them. Every temporal deliverance should be received as an earnest of eternal salvation; the honour of which must be ascribed to the Lord, who confers that blessing on his people.—But we shall cease to wonder at the troubles of the king of Israel, and almost to think of our own light afflictions, if we duly look unto Jesus, and contrast his glory and his grace, with the contempt and cruelty with which he was treated. Having yielded himself to death, he sanctified the grave, and became the first-fruits of the resurrection; his head was then lifted up above his enemies; and thus he hath opened the kingdom of heaven to all believers. His enemies, therefore, will surely be disappointed and perish; but his people may go down to the grave, as to their beds, in hope and comfort; for the same God watches over them in both, and they will at length awake to everlasting happiness.

PSALM V.

A. M. 2484.

B. C. 1520.

David prays, and purposes to persist in prayer, 1-3. He shews that God abhors the wicked, 4-6. He professes hope in God's mercy; and intreats his guidance, because of the malice of his enemies, 7-9. He predicts that the wicked will be destroyed, and the righteous made prosperous and joyful, 10-12.

To the chief Musician upon Nehiloth, A Psalm of David.

GIVE ear to my words, O LORD, consider <sup>my</sup> meditation.

2 Harken <sup>unto</sup> the voice of my cry, <sup>my</sup> King; and my God: for <sup>unto</sup> thee will I pray.

3 <sup>My</sup> voice shalt thou hear in the morning, O LORD; in the morning will I direct <sup>my</sup> prayer unto thee, and will look up.

8 <sup>Lead</sup> me, O LORD, in thy righteousness, because of <sup>mine</sup> enemies; <sup>make</sup> thy way straight before my face.

will they appear, who despise his personal and mediatorial glory, refuse to have him to reign over them, and revile him in his disciples: O may they stand in awe, and no longer thus sin against their only remedy: may they come to him, and trust in his atoning sacrifice; and then offer their sacrifices of righteousness, of prayer, praise, and thanksgiving, and every good work, which through him are to the praise and glory of God! (Notes, Rom. xii. 1. Phil. iv. 14-20. Heb. xiii. 15. 16. 1 Pet. 4-6.)

NOTES.

PSALM. V. Title. "Nehiloth" is interpreted by some to denote wind-instruments of music; and Neginoth, (vi. 1.) stringed instruments. Others suppose that "Nehiloth" implies, that the psalm was sung in parts. But the word occurs nowhere else in Scripture, and the meaning of it is uncertain.

V. 1. It is not certain, whether this psalm was composed during Absalom's rebellion, or while David was persecuted by Saul: but the latter seems most probable.—The word, rendered "meditation" seems to denote those inward thoughts, desires, fears, or sorrows, which break forth in earnest prayers, or find relief by complaining unto God.

V. 2-6. (Notes, x. 16. xlv. 4. Hab. i. 12-16. Heb. xii. 14. Rev. xxi. 22-27.)—The word, rendered "foolish," signifies insane or mad; denoting the infatuation of sinners, when urged on by their unbridled passions, to venture all consequences for the sake of present gratification. (Note, Ec. ix. 1-3.)—While men continue impenitent, their characters are abominable in the sight of God; they abide under his wrath; and, if they die in that state, they must be eternally the object of his abhorrence. The penitent sinner's character and state are changed, and he is reconciled to God: but sin is irreconcilably the object of divine hatred. (Marg. Ref. Notes, Rev. xxi. 5-8. xxii. 14, 15.)

V. 7, 8. (Marg. Ref.) <sup>My</sup> enemies would gladly see me trip, and they watch for my halting; therefore order my goings, that I may never fall, and give them an advantage against me:—For with what triumph would they spread abroad my real faults, who now stick not to tell all manner of lies of me! (Bp. Patrick.)

V. 9. St. Paul quotes this, among other scriptures, to prove the depravity of both Jews and Gentiles in an unconverted state; (Notes, Rom. iii. 10-20.)—If the Israelites, with all their advantages, manifested such vile dispositions, in opposing "the man after God's own heart," and afterwards in their conduct towards their promised Messiah; it is plain that the whole race must be corrupt and alienated from God; that nothing, except an internal renovation by the Spirit of God, can make them holy: and that they can never find acceptance with God upon the ground of their own obedience to his righteous laws; but must be saved meritoriously, if at all. The flattery, treachery, and calumny, with which the Israelites behaved towards their anointed king, originated from their hatred to God and holiness; and the profane, polluting, and abominable discourse, springing from the loathsome filthiness of their hearts, resembled the opening of a sepulchre, which would both be very noisome and unwholesome.—Some, however, consider the open sepulchre as an emblem of rapacity and sensuality. (Note, Prov. xxx. 15, 16.)

V. 10, 11. These verses might be rendered more literally as follows: <sup>Deal</sup> with them as guilty, O God! They shall fall by their own counsels. But all those who put their trust in thee shall rejoice; they shall shout for joy for ever, because thou defendest them. They that love thy name shall be joyful in thee.—The future tense is indeed often used in the Hebrew for the imperative, or the optative mood; and there is not that precision in it, as to tenses and moods, which prevails in many other languages. But where the literal rendering contains simply a prediction, and changing the future for the imperative or optative, implies an imprecation or a wish: the literal version is certainly preferable. Yet it cannot be denied, that the form of imprecation is often used; as implying that the impenitent enemies of God and Christ will perish, with the approbation of all holy creatures; and that the very prayers of believers for themselves and the church, will be answered in the destruction of their enemies. (Marg. Ref. Notes, xxxv. 25-28. lxxviii. 1-3. lxxix. 22-28. cix. 6-20.)

V. 12. (Note, iii. 3-5.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

Before we offer our prayers unto the Lord, we should seriously meditate on his perfections and promises, and on our own character and wants; that our words may be spoken with recollection, from a full heart, in a due sense of our indigence, dependence, and unworthiness, and with fervency and expectation.

—If we willingly submit to him as our King, and worship him as our God, we may expect every thing from his almighty favour.—Whilst many are eagerly presenting their petitions to earthly princes, let us make our requests known to our God and King. It is our privilege that we may come before him as often, and ask as much, as we will: and it must be our sin and folly, if we do not avail ourselves of his condescension and bounty. We should take care that he may hear our voice every morning, as the first and best employment of the day, in order that we may find help and comfort from him, in the various events of it: and let us not forget Him, "who arose a great while before day, and departed into a solitary place, and there prayed;" lest we should yield to sloth, or admit carnal excuses for our negligence. (Note, Luke vi. 12. P. O. 1-19.) In this sacred exercise, our affections should be directed to the Lord, and we should look up to him for help; expecting an answer from him as we do to a letter which we have directed to a kind friend.

—Such prayer will determine the heart against every sin: for though the Lord pities sinners, yet he "has no pleasure in iniquity;" nor can we walk or dwell with him, whilst any sin reigns in our hearts. How great then is the folly and madness of the wicked! and how will they endure to be driven from his presence, as the objects of his unchangeable and eternal detestation! Indeed we none of us could come before God, if it were not for his abounding mercy: humility and reverence then become us in all our worship; and we must always look unto Jesus Christ, the true temple, in whom God dwelleth, as reconciled to the believing sinner. (Note, 1 Kings viii. 28-30.) His true worshippers will have many enemies and observers, which will increase their temptations, and render their path more perplexed; but if this excite them to greater watchfulness, and render them more fervent in prayer to be led in the straight way of righteousness, it will be of great service to them.—We need not wonder at the cruelty, treachery, hypocrisy or flattery of our enemies, when we consider how David, and how Christ was treated; but we should remember that we are by nature as depraved as our opposers; that we may renewedly repent of the sinful thoughts, words, and actions of our past lives; that we may still watch over our own hearts, and against all polluting or dissembling conversation, and that we may bless God for restraining or converting grace, and for Jesus Christ and his salvation. We must, by no means, desire and pray for the destruction of our enemies; but we may predict the ruin of God's enemies, who will "fall by their own counsels, and in the multitude of their iniquities; and their enmity to his people will be proved to have sprung from their rebellion against him. But we should earnestly pray for and help the joy of the righteous; they trust in the Lord's mercy, grace, and providence, and desire to love his name and walk in his ways: he is their shield and salvation, and his favour shall protect and bless them for ever.—Neither their former sins, nor their present defects, temptations, conflicts, or troubles, should be allowed to silence their praises, or prevent their rejoicing. Joy is their privilege, their duty, and their strength; and they should be exhorted to "rejoice in the Lord always."

PSALM VI. (v. Note, Title.) Sheminit. This word signifies the eighth : and some suppose that the psalm, or tune, was adapted to a harp with eight strings.—This is the first of the penitential psalms : but it is not known on what occasion it was written.

V. 1, 2. 'Though I deserve destruction, yet let thy mercy pity my frailty.' (Notes, Is. lviii. 15. 16. Jer. x. 23—25.)—Are vexed: or are shaken.

V. 3, 4. (Notes, xiii. 1—4. xciv. 1—7.)—‘Return, O Lord, in mercy to my soul, and relieve and comfort me.’ (Marg. Ref.)

V. 5. The psalmist pleaded, that if God cut him off in his wrath, it would terminate all his opportunities of serving, and glorifying him on earth; and if left finally to perish, he should never remember God with gratitude and praise any more to eternity. (Notes, xxx. 9, 10. lxxxvii. 10—12. Is. xxxix. 17—20.) The word rendered grave, is often translated hell, and it seems generally to mean the place of separate spirits, happy or unhappy, according to the context; yet, it sometimes must be understood of the grave, and that seems the sense in this place. (Note, xvi. 8—11.)

V. 6, 7. Bowed down by most distressing sickness, and sufferings of various kinds, and conscious of deep repentance ; which, concurring with his corrections, caused him, every night, to water his couch with copious tears, and made him waste, become dull-sighted, and grow old prematurely : David earnestly pleaded with God to visit him in mercy, without further delay. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 8-10. The psalmist, having deeply humbled himself before God, at length found his peace and hope revive. As he trusted that the Lord would not leave him to perish in another world, with the workers of iniquity, he resolved not to associate with them in this : and he warned them to repent, and cease from their enmity to him ; otherwise he was assured, that shame and vexation would suddenly and irrevocably seize upon them. Many mournful psalms end thus triumphantly, for the encouragement of other mourners to hope and pray. (Notes, xiii. 5, 6. xxx. 9-12.)—The old version, more literally, thus renders the last verse, 'All my enemies shall be confounded and sore vexed ; they shall be turned back, and put to shame suddenly.'—This is certainly preferable. (Note, v. 10, 11.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

Infidels, profligates, and hypocrites, have always more noticed David's sins, than his mourning for them; for the former serve for an objection to the truths which they hate, and an excuse for the sins that they love; but they are not disposed to imitate him in the latter.—Great tenderness of conscience, and a disposition to mourn for sin with brokenness of heart, distinguish the believer from all other men; he may be overtaken in a fault, nay, he may fall into grievous transgression; but recollection fills him with anguish; or, if for a space he be, as it were, stupified, rebukes and corrections bring him to himself:

and, while conscience performs its salutary, but painful office, and he is suffering under the rod of his offended Father, he not unfrequently becomes afraid of his hot displeasure. Ashamed and trembling, he then deprecates eternal misery. Pains and enfeebling diseases, which vex his bones, may excite his prayers for deliverance; but the sense of divine wrath, which vexes his soul, renders him most earnest in crying out, "O Lord, how long?" how long will it be ere thou givest me some token of thy pardoning love? ere thou returnest to glorify thy mercy in saving my soul? The true penitent desires to live on earth, to remember and give thanks to his God; and he seeks the deliverance of his soul from hell, and the resurrection of the body from the grave, for the same purpose.—To enjoy the favour, and celebrate the praises, of his God and Saviour, form that happiness on earth and in heaven, which he desires; but he cannot endure the thought of ceasing for ever to love and praise him. His sorrow for sin is inward, and flows most in retirement: groans and tears express the compunction of his heart; and when his crimes have dishonoured God, and caused his enemies to exult and triumph, and returning comforts are withheld, his spirits are exhausted, his eye is dimmed, and he seems to wax old before his time. But such mourning will issue in rejoicing: the Lord will not number the weeping penitent with "the workers of iniquity;" for he will separate from them, and rebuke and warn them. His very tears have a prevailing voice with God, who hath heard, and will hear his prayers: and all they who rejoice in the falls and sorrows of the Lord's devoted servants, will be "put to shame, vexed, and perish suddenly," unless they repent.—Sinners of every rank have sorrowed and wept for their transgressions; but Jesus alone was a sinless sufferer, and through his sufferings, and in no other way, can the penitent find mercy. At length he will bid the impenitent workers of iniquity to depart from him; then will all his enemies be confounded, vexed, and perish with an everlasting destruction.

NOTES.

PSALM. VII. Title. ‘Shiggaion’ signifies wandering, or variable; and, it is probable, denotes the music to which the psalm was set.—Many conjectures have been formed concerning Cushi; but at last we only know, that he was of the same tribe with Saul, and most likely one of his relations and courtiers, who brought some false accusation against David. (Notes, 1 Sam. xxii. 7, 8. xxvi. 19.)

V. 1, 2. In extreme danger, the psalmist, according to his custom, resorted to God by faith and prayer. He had many persecutors: but it is probable that the one, whom he distinguishes from the rest, was Saul, who was so enraged against him, and had so much power in his hands, that he both could and would have torn him in pieces, as a lion doth his prey; nor would any have attempted to deliver him, had not God been his protector. (Notes, 1 Sam. xxii. 9—19. xiii. 26—28.)

V. 3-5. David here appealed to God for his innocence, as to the charges brought against him. So far from having risen up, as an enemy or traitor, against his prince, when at peace with him, or even returned evil for the evil requital which his eminent services had received, (as some explain the clause,) he had twice preserved the life of his treacherous and implacable persecutor, who had not the smallest cause for his cruel enmity. (Notes, 1 Sam. xx. 1-6. xxiv. xxvi. 8-25.) If this were not the case, and if the accusations of his enemies were true, he was willing to lose his life and reputation, and to be exposed to the deepest ignominy. (Notes, Job xxxi. 5-12. 16-23. 38-40. Jer. xvii. 14-18. xviii. 19, 20. 2 Cor. xi. 7-12.)—Selah, (5.) Maxime Exceedingly, (Latin.)

V. 6, 7. David was assured that the Lord intended to cut off Saul; (Notes, 1 Sam. xv. 27-29, xxiv. 8-15, xxv. 23-31, xxvi. 8-12.) This was "the judgment which he had commanded," and for which David prayed, not only on his own account, but for the sake of the people. Saul's tyranny, and neglect of his duty, had crushed and scattered the Israelites: and his persecution and impiety had driven them from the ordinances and worship of God, and seduced them into many crimes. The psalmist therefore prayed that the righteous Judge would ascend his exalted tribunal, exert his omnipotent authority, and, by some visible interposition, check the progress of impiety, and give encouragement to his servants; that they might again be collected in his courts, and unite in his holy worship. (Notes, lxxv. 2-10. cxli. 6-10. Jer. xii. 1-4. Marg. Ref.) The verbs are imperative.

V. 8-11. The heart-searching Judge of the world not only decides on men's conduct towards him, but in all the causes between one and another. (Notes, xvii. 1-3. 1 Pet. ii. 18-25.) To him therefore David referred the cause between him and his persecutors, desiring to be judged, in this respect, according to his righteousness and integrity, which were known to God. (Notes, xxvi. 1. 2 Sam. xxii. 21-28.) He both prayed that the wickedness of the wicked might cease, and predicted that it would; and that God would establish the righteous.—He was assured, that the righteous Judge and Preserver of the upright would defend him as a buckler, (Marg.) and would at length, manifest that anger, which was every day excited by the crimes of his enemies.—"How few among Christians seriously and deliberately consider, whether the sentence of that day," (the day of judgment,) "is likely to be in their favour; yet how many, with the utmost composure and self-complacency, repeat continually the words of this psalm, as well as those in the Te Deum, We believe that thou shalt come to be our Judge!" (Horne.)

V. 12, 13. "Vengeance will certainly come, though it stay long, and not fail to do execution; for it is decreed in heaven, (if they do not repent;) and will pierce through the heart of Saul, and the rest of my fierce and outrageous persecutors." (Bp. Patrick.) (Note, 6, 7.)

V. 14-16. "When an evil thought is instilled into the heart of a man, the seed of the wicked one is sown; by cherishing the diabolical suggestion, "he conceiveth" a purpose of mischief; then "he travaileth with iniquity," and at length, by carrying it into action, he "bringeth forth falsehood." (Horne.) (Note, Jam. i. 13-15.) The prosecutor especially being determined upon iniquity, is restless and in torment, till he can effect his purpose, by any method of deceit and violence. But, with vast expense and trouble, he only digs a pit for himself, and the ruin he aimed at others, falls on the crown of his own head, and gives him a mortal wound. "Thus Saul was killed by the Philistines," whom he wanted to employ in cutting off David; (Notes, 1 Sam. xviii. 17-27. xxxi. 2-5;) and the Jews, who excited the Romans to crucify Christ, were destroyed by them, and even crucified in great numbers." (Note, Matt. xxvii. 24, 25.)

V. 17. Most High. (Notes, lxxxiii. 13-18. Is. lvii. 16, 17. Dan. iv. 10-18. 35-37. v. 18-24.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The servants of God must expect the persecution of the tongue as a preparation for further injuries; and to the ingenuous mind it often appears very formidable. But no slanderers or persecuting tyrants can do real harm to those who trust in the Lord their God: when there is none else to deliver, he will take care, both of their persons and characters, and will preserve them from Satan that "accuser of the brethren," and "devouring lion," and "from every evil work, unto his heavenly kingdom."—Let us then wage our warfare with the weapons of faith and prayer; and, instead of injuring our peaceful neighbours, let us persevere in endeavouring to overcome evil with good. This will enable us to rejoice in the testimony of our consciences, when loaded with slander and obloquy, and to appeal to God with confidence. But "wretched they who persecute their benefactors! Happy he who can reflect that he has been a benefactor to his persecutors!" (Horne.) Indeed the Christian would deem himself worthy of all the injury and ignominy which his foes intend him, were he guilty of the crimes of which they accuse him.—But, whilst we patiently bear the injuries to which we are exposed, we should be moved to behold "one sinner destroying much good;" and we ought to pray that the Lord would convert or remove all those who scatter and oppress his people, and effectually interpose to encourage their faith and obedience, and to stop the growth of impiety and infidelity.—When earthly judges abuse their power, it is a comfort to reflect that the Lord will reverse their decrees, and plead the cause of his people: he is a judge who "trieth the heart and reins," nor can we stand before him, even according to his new covenant of mercy, without "simplicity and godly sincerity," and conscientious integrity in our whole conduct. The Lord is every day provoked by the wicked; and, whilst he waiteth to receive the submissions and pardon the sins of those who repent and turn to him, he is preparing to execute judgment on all the impenitent. But persecutors must expect his severest vengeance. Satan suggests, and they welcome the mischievous imagination; and iniquity and murders are thus conceived, and then effected by lies and treachery. Let them, however, remember that they are only plotting their own destruction: for the persecuted servants of the Lord will be celebrating his praises and rejoicing in his favour, whilst their persecutors are cast into the pit of destruction, and enduring the wrath of their righteous Judge; and all their subtle projects will concur in bringing about this final event.—Let us, then, under all our trials, look unto the Saviour. He alone was perfect in righteousness; yet none was ever reviled, slandered, and hated as he was. He lived and died doing good to his enemies, and praying for them: but after his exaltation, the welfare of his church required that judgment should be executed upon such as continued impenitent. The Jews first felt the weight of his indignation, and then vast multitudes of Gentile converts compassed him about. Wherever antichristian corrupters or persecutors have been from time to time destroyed, the church has been replenished with numerous real converts to the faith; and when these enemies of the truth shall finally come to an end, the whole earth will be filled with truth and righteousness. Shortly will arrive that final judgment which God hath decreed; when all unbelievers will finally perish; may we, at that solemn season, 'be numbered with his saints in glory everlasting!'

NOTES.

PSALM. VIII. Title. "Gittith" perhaps is the name of some tune which David had learned when in Gath, or from the Gittites, and to which this and two other psalms were set. (Marg. Ref.)—Various other conjectures have been formed; and the following may be considered as the most probable. 'I take it to have been composed by David, after he had overthrown Goliath of Gath, which is a lively emblem of Christ's conquest over our great enemy, the devil.' (Bp. Patrick.)

V. 1. The eternal JEHOVAH, the universal Creator and Benefactor, is that Lord and Governor whom all ought entirely to obey and serve; and to him believers render willing obedience, as God, their Saviour. He infinitely excels all creatures in every thing which can excite love and adoration. The earth is full of the discoveries of his perfections, and his glory fills the highest heavens, and is exalted far above them.—"O LORD, our Governor," (Prayer Book version.)

V. 2. God hath often magnified his own perfections through the simplicity and weakness of the instruments by which he accomplishes his grand designs. (Note, Judg. vii. 13-22. P. O. 16-25.)—The new born infant is such a display of his power, skill, and goodness, as unanswerably to confute the cavils of atheism. Even little children have been taught so to love and serve him, that their praises and confessions have baffled and silenced the rage and malice of persecutors: and thus a victorious strength has been manifested by them, while the wise, learned, and mighty have either joined the enemy, or timidly and feebly crouched before him.—The meaneast and most despised persons have often been made successful in their attempts to promote his cause. Thus David overcame Goliath, though but as a babe in comparison of that insulting champion: (Notes, 1 Sam. xvii. 34-38;) and the despised Nazarene, with his obscure and unlettered apostles, prevailed against the combined wisdom, learning, and power of the world, and the sagacity and influence of Satan, the god of the world. And by successive instruments whom man disdains, the same cause shall still more fully prevail, till every avenger and enemy is finally stilled, and all the wicked are silent in darkness. (Notes, Matt. xi. 25, 26. 1 Cor. i. 26-31. 2 Cor. iv. 7.)—The Septuagint render the clause, which is here translated according to the Hebrew, "ordained strength," "perfected praise;" and the Evangelist, recording our Lord's words, gives them according to that version. (Note, Matt. xxi. 14-16.)

V. 3. The psalmist appears to have composed this sacred hymn while his attention was fixed, during the silence of the evening, on "the moon walking in brightness," and "stars of light;" but, instead of being tempted to worship the heavenly host, he contemplated the magnificent scene and the immensity of the creation, till he was filled with adoring admiration of the Creator's incomprehensible majesty, which naturally suggested the subsequent reflections. (Notes, cxlviii. 3. Deut. iv. 19. Job xxxi. 24-28.)

6 Thou <sup>r</sup>madest him to have dominion over the works of thy hands; thou hast <sup>s</sup>put all things under his feet:

7 <sup>t</sup>All sheep and oxen, yea, and the beasts of the field:

8 <sup>u</sup>The fowl of the air, and the fish of the sea, and whatsoever passeth through the paths of the seas.

PSALM IX.

David praises God for punishing his enemies, and maintaining his cause, 1-6. He shows that God will preserve his servants, and calls on them to praise his name, 7-12. He prays for deliverance from present trials, that he may still praise the Lord; and predicts the ruin of the wicked, 13-20.

V. 4-9. Adam, even when created in the image of God, was infinitely beneath his Maker; and it was an unspeakable favour for him to be placed at the head of this lower world in a state of honour and dominion. (Note, Gen. i. 25, 26.) After the fall, it was still more wonderful that his children should be permitted to retain any authority over, or derive any benefit from, the different orders of creatures. But the apostle teaches us, that the Holy Spirit, who spake by David, especially intended Christ, the eternal Son of God, who, by his incarnation, became the Son of man. Thus he was "made a little lower than the angels," by assuming and dwelling in a nature inferior to theirs, "for the suffering of death;" which object having been accomplished, he arose from the dead, and was "crowned with glory and honour;" and in human nature exercises universal dominion, even an authority infinitely more extensive and absolute than ever the first Adam possessed, or could possibly have administered. (Note, Heb. ii. 5-9.)—In so wonderful a manner did the God of glory shew himself mindful of mean, feeble, mortal, sinful man! and thus has he visited and honoured one of our race, for the common benefit of all who believe in him! (Note, Ps. cxliv. 3, 4.)—The word rendered angels is the same which is generally translated God, or gods; yet the apostle from the Septuagint renders it angels, which shews the latitude with which the term is used. (Notes, lxxxii. 6. John x. 32-37.) But when the true God is meant, it is, though plural, always joined with the singular verb; and the name JEHOVAH is never given but to the true God; and, when applied to Christ, it shews who he is, even "the true God and eternal life."

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

No words can express the glorious excellency of JEHOVAH, our Ruler and Lord; nor can cherubim or seraphim reach his worthiness by their most exalted adorations: yet he graciously accepts the feeblest efforts of men on earth, and even counts himself honoured by the praises of babes and sucklings! He works by the feeblest instruments, for the greater confusion of his enemies, and the honour of his name; and all the vengeance and rage of earth and hell shall soon be stilled by the prevalence of his despised gospel.—Every creature speaks the Creator's praise to the mind of the devout believer, whose pious contemplations render his solitary walks unspeakably pleasant and profitable. But each display of the Divine glory should lead us to reflect on our own vileness. What indeed is man, that the Lord should still visit him, and be mindful of him? What are we, but mean, guilty, polluted, ungrateful, rebellious, and apostate creatures? We are unworthy of the least of those manifold advantages, which we derive from the sheep and oxen, the fishes and the fowls, and the other animals, which are still subjected to us, and subservient to our benefit: nor should we ever partake of these common mercies without admiration joined with gratitude. But in the person of Emmanuel, every other instance of divine condescension is eclipsed; all our thoughts are swallowed up. His love, his humiliation in assuming our nature; his atoning sufferings unto death; his subsequent glory, and his dominion over all creatures, which shall endure till all enemies are put under his feet, can never sufficiently be admired and adored.—Thus our nature, in the second Adam, is infinitely more honoured and exalted, than it could have been in the first Adam. Thus also the true dignity of human nature, even the worth of a rational, immortal soul, though ruined by sin, yet capable of recovery and eternal felicity, is clearly shewn. And if we trust and submit to Christ as our Saviour and Lord, he will advance us also to glory, honour, and immortality. We had indeed cause to celebrate the excellencies of the Lord, our Governor, as displayed in the works of creation; but what words can reach his praises, who is now become our salvation, and has acquired a new right to our subjection, as our Redeemer, and for filling the earth with those glories, "which angels desire to look down into!"

death; and some imagine that "labben" may denote Goliath, either in respect of his eminence, or his coming as a champion between the armies of Israel and that of the Philistines. Goliath is called, Ish Habbeneim, (a man who comes between;) translated "a champion." (1 Sam. xvii. 2.) If, however, this be the meaning, it is very obscurely expressed: and, as Zion was not the place of Israel's assembling for public worship, till David had for some time been king over all Israel, the psalm must have been composed long after Goliath's death. (11-14.) Others therefore suppose "Muth-labben" to mean, the death of his son, and refer the occasion of the psalm to the death of Absalom.—The psalmist might have some reference to the various deliverances of his past life; but he was also led, while praising God for them, to speak, as the type of Christ, concerning his conflicts and victories; and those of his church, and of her triumphs over every heathen and antichristian persecutor, including also the trials and deliverances of every believer.

V. 1-3. The psalmist determined, on occasion of some recent deliverance, to "praise JEHOVAH with his whole heart;" not feignedly, not as ascribing any share of the honour to himself, not in a cold and languid manner, but fervently and zealously.—He would make the works, which God had wrought for him, known to all around: and thus rejoice in ascribing glory to his name, and in reflecting what a powerful and faithful patron and friend he had, and what an honour and benefit this was to him. His enemies hitherto had been turned back, and had stumbled and perished; not by his valour, but by the presence and power of God; and this made him confident of continued victories and final triumph. (Notes, xxvii. 1-3. 2 Sam. xxii. 37-42.)—This admits of the most obvious application to the works of God for his church, and for every believer; and no doubt was intended by the Holy Spirit, to be thus used in our worship and meditations.—O thou most high. (5.) "God is in the loftiest and most exalted pre-eminence and sovereignty over the whole creation; and in essence and glory, surpassing all comprehension." (Marg. Ref.)

V. 4-6. God had pleaded David's righteous cause against the wicked persecution of Saul, and had advanced him to the throne of all Israel, with the destruction of almost the whole family of Saul. He had given his king the victory over the surrounding heathen nations; who perished in great numbers, and had finally lost the reputation of their former successes. So that every enemy which had before destroyed the cities of Israel, was deprived perpetually of power to continue these desolations; and most of them soon became so insignificant, that the memorial of them, and of their former greatness, perished with them.—The marginal reading here seems to give the proper sense. The destructions caused by the enemy were terminated; God had destroyed their cities; and the remembrance of them had failed from among men.—Thus likewise the renowned monarchies, that successively made havoc on earth, and oppressed Israel, are now destroyed and almost forgotten: the first opposers of Christ and Christianity have shared the same fate: and all these divine interpositions are earnest of the final ruin of all the enemies of the cause of Christ. (Notes, Dan. ii. 38-45.)

V. 7-12. The reflection on the transient glory of earthly kingdoms, and illustrious conquerors, led the psalmist to reflect on the eternity of JEHOVAH, and of his universal kingdom. This eternal Sovereign did not, indeed, immediately inflict vengeance on his enemies; but he was preparing his throne of judgment. He would soon judge the whole human race in righteousness; and uprightly, or according to his declarations and promises, decide on the cause of each individual belonging to the people of Israel, and all other nations. In the mean while, he would prove a refuge for the protection and comfort of such, as were oppressed or persecuted for his sake, to which they should resort in times of trouble or danger. (Notes, lxii. 8-10. 2 Sam. xxii. 2, 3. Prov. xviii. 10, 11. Is. xxxii. 1, 2.)—Indeed, all who, by believing his word and experiencing his faithfulness and mercy, had obtained the knowledge of his name or perfections, would trust in him entirely and exclusively; for it had never been known, that the Lord had forsaken any that sought him, because

All our mercies should be acknowledged before God, in fervent praises: the whole glory of every success, or deliverance, belongs to him; our whole heart should be lifted up to him in rendering him this tribute; we should delight in shewing forth publicly his marvellous works, to us and to his church; and our joy must not rest in any of the gifts of our God, but ascend to him, and centre in him as our all-sufficient portion.—The enemies of Christ and of his people for a time may stand their ground, and prevail : but in due season, they will be dismayed ; and, beginning to fall, they will “ perish at his presence.”—He, who advanced David, and maintained his righteous cause ; he, who exalted the Saviour “ to his own right hand in heavenly places,” in defiance of his enemies, will shortly bring to an end the wickedness of persecuting tyrants, and they shall perish with eternal infamy : this almighty Lord will help the Christian in all his conflicts and temptations, and support and comfort him in all his troubles, till he be finally delivered from the body of sin ; and till “ Satan be bruised under his feet,” and death itself “ swallowed up in victory.” The eternal God hath already prepared his throne for judgment : he will certainly execute judgment in righteousness and in faithfulness ; and then every iniquitous sentence will be reversed, and every oppressor punished.—In the mean while, all “ who know his name, will trust in him,” for temporal protection and eternal salvation ; and their experience will daily increase their knowledge and confirm their faith ; for the Lord never did, and never will, forsake or reject any, who seek his favour according to his word. He is “ in Christ reconciling the world unto himself ;” he may be found on a mercy-seat : let saints then sing praises to him, and call upon sinners to come and trust in him. The blood of many martyrs has been shed, and their persecutors have supposed that no inquisition would be made for it : but from time to time the Lord anticipates that day, when “ the earth shall disclose her blood, and shall no more cover her slain.” He is ever mindful of the cry of the humble. His consolations more than counterbalance outward afflictions, and if any are cut off by martyrdom, their souls are forwarded to heaven. There the church is triumphant ; here it must be militant. Satan, who hates us, will stir up opposition, and excite our depravity by his suggestions : but the Lord, who hath lifted us up from the gates of death and hell, considers all our conflicts and temptations ; he will give us merciful deliverances on earth, that we may praise him with his people ; and in a little time will completely rescue our souls ; that in his temple above, we may rejoice in his salvation and triumph in his praise. Then the wicked of every description will sink into the pit of destruction ; their own crimes will fall upon them, and they will be caught in their own snare : then especially, will the power and justice of God be made known to all the world, by “ the judgments that he executeth ;” and even whole nations of those, who forgot and despised him, shall be turned into hell, and for ever shut up in that region of darkness and despair.—Many of his people are here permitted to be poor and afflicted, and seem to be forgotten ; and they are all poor in spirit, and have nothing to trust to but his mercy and grace. But they shall not always be forgotten : their expectation of help and salvation from God shall not perish in disappointment for ever.—Often it hath seemed, as if man would prevail against the cause of God : but the church has prayed, her Advocate has pleaded, and the arm of the Lord has been extended ; some of her enemies have been judged, and have perished ; many have been intimidated, and others humbled in cordial submission ; so that the cause of God yet maintains its ground. Still we have abundant reason to unite in prayer, and to say, ‘ Arise, O Lord, let not Satan, or man, prevail, to confine thy church within such narrow limits, to corrupt it by so many heresies and scandals, or to distract it with so many divisions and disputes ; put those in fear and to shame, who arrogate more to themselves, than can belong to fallible, sinful, mortal man ; humble and convert every opposer, and destroy every system of superstition and delusion ; that all the inhabitants of the earth may know themselves to be lost, sinful men ; gladly welcome the Saviour, and become his willing subjects. Higeaion. Selah. Amen.’

PSALM X. V. 1. David's name is not prefixed to this psalm; yet it is probable, that it was composed by him; with reference to the persecution, which he, and the church of God, suffered during the reign of Saul; but it is applicable to similar cases in every age. Whilst the trial continues, and comfort and deliverance are withheld, the Lord seems to "hide himself," or to "stand at a distance," as regardless of the event: (Notes, xiii. 1—3. xxii. 1.) but he only waits to be called upon by importunate prayer, to come and deliver his people.

V. 2-11. Several of the psalms seem intentionally to have been written in general terms; that they might serve to direct the devotions of the church in persecution; and those of every believer in his personal troubles and afflictions.—Pride and ambition caused Saul to envy and hate David, as one who had eclipsed his glory, and who was appointed by God himself to the kingdom, as the man after his own heart: and therefore he persecuted him. (Notes, 1 Sam. xviii. 6-11. xx. 31.) The Jewish rulers hated Christ and his apostles, because their ignorance and hypocrisy were exposed, and their authority endangered, by the light of the gospel: and the same principle has made way for the persecution of the humble and zealous servants of God in all ages. But the psalmist predicted, that his enemies would ruin themselves, instead of him; for the original is in the future tense, "They shall be taken," &c.—Saul at length avowed and boasted of his desire of murdering David, which at first he concealed: and he "blesseth the covetous," who courted favour by betraying him. But God abhorred such men; as indeed they resembled Judas, who sold his Lord: and indeed they abhorred or despised him. (Heb. 12.) "The covetous he blesseth; he despiseth the Lord." (Notes, Zech. xi. 4-14.)—Saul, with evident haughtiness, refused to submit to the decree of God made known by Samuel, or to seek his favour; and in his subsequent conduct, he acted as an infidel or an atheist. He became grievously cruel and oppressive in his government, especially when he murdered the priests. (Notes, 1 Sam. xxii.) God's judgments were out of his sight: he believed nothing about them; and he scorned all those as enemies, who opposed his rage, growing more presumptuous by impunity. His conversation became a mixture of profaneness, perjury, violent imprecations, and deceit; and he was continually avowing his vile and mischievous purposes. (Notes, 1 Sam. xx. 30-33.) Personally, and by his agents, he watched for David in every place where he was likely to surprise him: being bent on murdering a poor fugitive who had never injured him, as much as a hungry lion is of seizing his prey. Nay, he even seemed to pay court, and humble himself, to David and others, as well as to stoop to the meanest practices, that he might get him within his reach, and murder him by one of his captains. This deliberate plan of virulent opposition to one whom God had expressly marked out as the object of his special favour, could be the result of nothing except contempt of God, and practical atheism. (Notes, xxvii. 1-4.)

V. 12, 13. The honour of God required, that such impious persons, who despised him and defied his wrath, should be openly rebuked; and his oppressed servants who entrusted their cause with him, as openly delivered. (Marg. Ref.)—"What is it but thy long-suffering, that makes the wicked thus insolently despise thee? He concludes that thou wilt never punish him, because thou art so patient with him." (Bp. Patrick.)

V. 14, 15. Though the Lord did not immediately appear to punish the persecutors, the psalmist was fully assured, that he observed with strict attention all the mischief and malice which were shewn; and would by his power openly requite his enemies. In confidence of this, his poor and persecuted servants "left themselves" in his hands, as destitute orphans who had no other helper, but who were assured of his compassionate protection. They also prayed against their oppressor, that God would "break his arm," (or deprive him of power,) and search out, in order to terminate, his wickedness, that none of it might remain. (Marg. Ref.)—Break. (15.) This is imperative. (Notes, lviii. 6-9. Ez. xxx. 20-26. Zech. xi. 15-16.)

PSALM XII.

David, lamenting the decay of godliness, and the prevalency of deceit, craves help from God, 1, 2. He predicts the destruction of flatterers, proud boasters, and oppressors, 3—5. He comforts himself in assurance of divine protection, grounded on the faithful promises of God, notwithstanding the triumph of the wicked, 6—8.

To the chief Musician upon *Sheminith, A Psalm

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The servant of God should abide in his place and at his work, though it expose him to many dangers and difficulties : and the honour of God, the interests of his people, and regard to consistency of character, require eminent persons to expose themselves more, in times of persecution, than their inferiors are called to do. (Notes, Neh. vi. 10—14. Dan. vi. 10, 11. Acts viii. 1.) But the believer, when not terrified by the power and rage of his enemies, will frequently be tempted to desert his post, or to neglect his work, by the fears of his friends. They will clearly see his danger ; but, through want, or weakness, of faith, they will not perceive his security ; and they will often give him counsel which savours of worldly policy, rather than of heavenly wisdom. But such dangerous temptations must be rejected with firmness and decision. Let it not be thought, that, in times of prevailing iniquity, when all regard to the laws of God and man is discarded, the righteous can do no good. ‘ All is not over, while there is a man left to reprove error, and bear testimony to the truth ; and a man, who does this with a becoming spirit, may stop a prince, or senate, when in full career, and recover the day.’—‘ No place on earth is out of the reach of care and trouble. Temptations are every where ; and so is the grace of God.’ (Horne.)—The upright and zealous servants of God are indeed peculiarly exposed to the malice of wicked persecutors, who commonly have power on their side ; but let us not forget the almighty God. Upon his mercy-seat he hears the prayers, and defends the cause, of his people ; but into that holy temple the daring sinner hath no access. On his exalted throne he ruleth over all the kings of the earth ; he notices all the devices of his enemies, and the perils of his friends : he will permit the persecutor to proceed just as far as is requisite to prove and increase the faith and holiness of his servants. (Note, lxxvi. 10. cxv. 3.) But he abhorreth those who delight in cruelty and violence, and will shortly assign them their horrible portion in the pit of destruction. He loveth his own image in his people ; he beholds them with complacency and paternal care ; he protects their lives till their work is done, and then receives them to his heavenly kingdom. And what hath he to fear, who hath a righteous cause, an almighty friend, and a faithful promise, on his side ? (Note, viii. 28—32.)

NOTES.

PSALM XII. V. 1—4. This psalm may be supposed to have been written, towards the end of Saul's reign; when his impiety and abuse of authority had given such a sanction to vice and ungodliness, that not only piety, but truth and honesty, seemed about to expire; while every kind of wickedness was practised without fear or shame.—Dissimulation, flattery, profane and arrogant boastings, treachery, and calumny, were the general recommendations of the superior people in Israel, to the favour of their king and his courtiers; and the infection spread rapidly among all orders of men. Forgetting to whom they were indebted for the gift of speech, and for what purpose it was given, and of their accountableness to God; they considered their tongues as their own, to be employed as they pleased; they thought to carry all before them, by their wit, eloquence, flatteries, or calumnies. But in fact they were only exposing themselves to the judgments of God, against flatterers and proud boasters. (Marg. Ref. Notes, li. lix. 3—8. Jer. ix. 3—6. Rom. iii. 9—18. Jam. iii. 12.)

V. 5, 6. For the comfort of the remnant of poor and persecuted believers, David addressed them in his prophetic character. The Lord assured them, that he noticed their oppressions, and regarded their sighs and sorrows : and that he was about to arise to punish their enemies, and set them in safety from the power, and the cruel sarcasms and menaces, to which they were exposed. And the psalmist reminded them, that they might confidently depend on this

PSALM XIV. V. 1. This psalm is thought to have been written on occasion of Absalom's rebellion, and the people's defection from their aged and pious king; and the mention of Zion, as the place whence salvation was to come, shews that it was composed some time after David came to the kingdom over all Israel. From the degeneracy of Israel shewn in that instance, the psalmist takes occasion to lament the general depravity of human nature: and

2 "The LORD looked down from heaven upon the children of men, to see if there were <sup>a</sup>any that did understand, and <sup>b</sup>seek God.

4 Have all the workers of iniquity no knowledge? who <sup>a</sup>eat up my people as they eat bread, <sup>a</sup>and call not upon the LORD.

the psalm is almost entirely the same as the fifty-third.—The word fool (Nabal) in scripture, denotes one who not only is destitute of true wisdom, but who hates it; the openly ungodly and wicked man. (Marg. Ref.) Persons of this description "like not to retain God in their knowledge," and therefore "say in their hearts, no God." Averse to obedience and submission to the authority of any superior, and even to the thoughts of an omnipotent ever-present, heart-searching, and righteous Governor and Judge; and disliking his spiritual worship and holy law; they secretly wish that there were no God: they try to hope there is none: they seek for arguments and objections against his existence, perfections, or authority; they try to believe what they wish to be true, and by the aid of Satan, through the just judgment of God, they in a measure succeed. In order, however, to exclude troublesome misgivings, and to strengthen their cause, they propagate these absurdities, and endeavour to make proselytes.—This is the real history of the rise and progress of atheism, that deepest stigma of human nature. Man having done abominable works, being conscious of guilt, and bent on further transgression, expects nothing but wrath from God, and so runs into atheism for a shelter from terror and alarm: unless idolatry, or some species of false religion, can be rendered equally efficacious in quieting the conscience and giving encouragement in sin. And, as speculative atheism is the offspring of a depraved heart and vicious life, it also tends to the increase of wickedness; till the fatal infection spreads, and produces general degeneracy and profligacy. (Note, Rom. i. 28—32.)

V. 2, 3. Upon the strictest scrutiny, the all-seeing Judge could not find one of the children of men, who understood his obligations, duty, and interest, or that sought the favour and glory of the Lord. All were turned aside from the right way, into different ways of disobedience: all were become filthy, corrupt, and putrid, or loathsome, in his sight; not one could be found disposed to do that which is spiritually good.—This must be understood of man left to himself, man as he is by nature, without regeneration; and St. Paul quotes the passage, to prove the need that both Jews and Gentiles have of redemption and salvation by grace, and through faith in Christ. (Notes, Rom. iii. 9—20.)—Between this verse and that which follows, three verses are inserted in the version used in the common prayer-book, which are taken from some copies of the Septuagint: for in any other copies they are not found, any more than in the Hebrew, or Syriac. The apostle, in the third chapter of Romans, has the same verses, and it is evident that he selected them from several parts of the Old Testament, especially from the fifth, thirty-sixth, and one hundred and fortieth psalms, and the fifty-ninth chapter of Isaiah: and it is probable, that some transcriber of the Septuagint inserted those verses from that remarkable passage of the apostle.

V. 4—6. Every kind of wickedness will, in the event, be found contrary to common sense and prudence. But they who persecute the worshippers of God, and take pleasure in this hateful employment, and refuse to ask any mercy or favour from him, do in effect set him at defiance, which is the height of madness and folly. (Notes, John iv. 31—34. Acts. viii. 1. xxvi. 9—11.) Yet, when they would cast off the fear of God, they become slaves to various terrors; and often add one crime to another, from fear of offending their fellow-creatures, or to avoid the consequences of their former misconduct. Whereas God dwelleth among the righteous, to protect them from dangers and alarms.—The psalmist having stated these general principles, remonstrates with his insulting enemies, for deriding the counsel of the poor believer, who maketh the Lord his refuge; when their own inward terrors evince, that they could not find security and comfort elsewhere.

V. 7. The more fully and deeply David experienced, and witnessed the depravity of man, and the disposition of Israel to apostatize; the more fervently he longed and prayed for the salvation of Israel, by the power and favour of JEHOVAH, who was worshipped on mount Zion: by this it is reasonable to suppose, that he did not merely intend Israel's deliverance from bondage, or subjection to foreign enemies, or to domestic usurpers; or of his own restoration to the throne, and return to the courts of God; but especially of the promised kingdom and salvation of the Messiah, the deliverance of his

PSALM XV.

The inhabitant of Zion, or character of the heirs of heaven, 1—5.

A Psalm of David.

5 <sup>a</sup>He that <sup>a</sup>putteth not out his money to usury, <sup>a</sup>nor taketh reward against the innocent. <sup>a</sup>He that doeth these things shall never be moved.

people from the "captivity" or bondage of Satan, to the liberty of God's service, with all its glorious and joyful effects. (Notes, 1 Chr. xvi. 35, 36. 2 Tim. ii. 23—26.)—Salvation, Jeshuah; nearly the same as Jesus. (Note, Matt. i. 20, 21.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS

All the wickedness of men's words and actions springs from the corrupt fountain of their hearts: and if the thoughts of ungodly persons were detected and published, (as they will be at the day of judgment,) how vile would they appear! (Note, 1 Cor. iv. 2—5.)—Infidelity and iniquity have a reciprocal influence on each other; and are progressive till men's foolish hearts become darkened, and atheism is conceived and promulgated. Men differ in their peculiar propensities and outward characters: but they are all naturally carnal, alienated from God, destitute of true wisdom, incapable of things spiritually good, gone aside from the right way, and corrupt in their desires and imaginations: and therefore all would have gone further, and sunk deeper in abominable works, continually and eternally, if it had not been for the inestimable redemption of Jesus Christ. We should be thankful, if we have been restrained from the more destructive excesses into which so many are hurried; but we ought not to rest in any thing short of union with Christ, and a new creation unto holiness by his Spirit. If we have experienced this blessed change, let us give the Lord all the glory; and let us pity and pray for our fellow-sinners.—The enmity of the human heart against God, not only appears from man's proud aversion to call upon his name; but from the delight, which in all ages men have taken in persecuting his offensive people: all, however, who engage in this attempt, will prove their own folly; and the terrors to which they have often been exposed, evince that they do violence to the light of their own consciences. However the poor believer may be derided, for his confidence in God, he has obtained such a refuge from every danger and enemy, as shall never make him ashamed: for God himself dwells among the righteous, and is their protector in every generation.—All our acquaintance with the depravity of human nature, should endear to us "salvation out of Zion": and whilst we rejoice in the earnestness, and are waiting for the completion of our own salvation, we should long and pray for the enlargement and prosperity of the church. When that expected season shall arrive, that the Jews shall be readmitted into the church; then indeed "will Jacob rejoice, and Israel be glad," and the event shall prove "as life from the dead," to the whole race of men. (Note, Rom. xi. 11—15.) But in heaven alone shall the whole company of the redeemed rejoice, without alloy or interruption for evermore.

PSALM XV. V. 1. It is probable, that as soon as the ark was stationed on mount Zion, the psalmist addressed himself to God; desirous of being taught who would be the accepted and persevering worshipper at his tabernacle. This was typical of the true church of God on earth; all the members of which are heirs also of heaven. (Note, Heb. xii. 22—25.) The enquiry, therefore is virtually, Who is he, that so worships God in this world, as to have a well-grounded hope of eternal life hereafter? It is not enquired, what are the grounds of a sinner's acceptance with God: on this subject we are fully instructed in other parts of Scripture. But what are the characteristic marks of those who are thus accepted, by which they may be distinguished from all other persons. And the answer evidently is, (in perfect consistency with the New Testament, and especially with St. John's first epistle;) "They may be distinguished by their sanctification." (Notes, 1 John ii. 3—6. 26—29. iii. 4—10. 18—24. v. 1—5.) Thus believers are conformed in their measure to Christ, the perfect exemplar: and the character, here given of them, forms a beautiful contrast to that of ungodly men, as delineated in the preceding psalm. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 2, 3. "The fruits meet for repentance;" "the work of faith, and labour of love, and patience of hope," "the fruits of the Spirit," and "the things which accompany salvation," are here compendiously enumerated, or rather pointed out, in some of the most striking and observable particulars. (Notes, Luke iii. 10—14. Gal. v. 22—26. 1 Thes. i. 1—4. Heb. vi. 9, 10.)

V. 4. "The vile person" is an openly wicked and ungodly man, who renders himself contemptible by his crimes. (Notes, 1 Sam. xxv. 6. 23—31. Dan.

PSALM XVIII.

David's psalm of thanksgiving, for his manifold deliverances, and singular prosperity, 1-50.

To the chief Musician, A Psalm of David, <sup>a</sup>the servant of the LORD, who spake unto the LORD the words of this song, <sup>a</sup>in the day that the LORD delivered him from the hand of all his enemies, and from the hand of Saul: And he said,

— 'No lion can be more desirous to tear a lamb in pieces, than Saul is to make a prey of me.' (Bp. Patrick.) Saul and his associates acted also with dark subtlety, and seemed to be thinking of something else, when they were watching their opportunity of mischief and murder. (Marg. Notes, vii. 14-16. 1 Sam. xix. 17-27. 22-28. Matt. xxvi. 3-5.)

V. 13-15. In this extremity, unless the Lord speedily interposed, (as one who had delayed till no more time could be lost,) to prevent Saul from accomplishing his wicked design, and to disappoint him of his prey, by some humiliating event, he would certainly take away David's life, and so render the promises of God of no effect: but this could not be.—Saul and his men had been as the "sword," and "hand" of God, by which he executed vengeance on many, and corrected others, in Israel; but they were mere mortal men of worldly spirit, who preferred an earthly portion to the favour of God: and consequently had their good things in this life. God indeed gave them abundance of those treasures, which are commonly hidden for security, and spent in self-indulgence: their children also were full, or had enough, and left their superfluity to their descendants. (Notes, xlix. 10, 11. 15-18. lxxiii. 11-14. Job xxi. 7-22. xxvii. 13-33.) But would God suffer his servant to be destroyed by such profane selfish men?—The psalmist, however, determined, whatever might be the event, to act as in the immediate presence of God, to maintain a good conscience, and to walk before God in righteousness; and then, whether he died soon, or lived many years, he should certainly at last obtain full satisfaction, when he awaked in the eternal world, or at the general resurrection, perfectly renewed to the Divine image in righteousness and true holiness.—The former clause of the last verse is here interpreted of David's purpose, and only the latter of his prospect. Some explain both to mean his expectation of happiness in the eternal world; yet not excluding his hope of deliverance from his urgent dangers.—The Septuagint render the last clause "I shall be satisfied in beholding thy glory." (Notes, xxxvi. 5-9. cxix. 111. Matt. v. 6. 8. 1 John iii. 1-3. Rev. xxi. 22-27. xxii. 2-5.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

Believers must follow their Saviour in the way, by which he passed through this world to glory; and such men as were his enemies will be their's also; but he was more hated, insulted, and cruelly intreated, than any of his followers ever were. They cannot, like Jesus, plead sinless perfection in any part or action of their lives: but through his merits and grace, they may rejoice in the testimony of their conscience to their simplicity and godly sincerity. (Note, 2 Cor. i. 12-14.) They have therefore right on their side, when oppressed or tempted: their own hearts do not condemn them of hypocrisy, and therefore they have confidence before a just and merciful God: their prayers are not the language of dissembling lips, but the fervent desires of their hearts, and they may expect that he will give sentence in their behalf, when they are slandered and injured; even such an equal sentence, as must proceed from the presence of a holy God.—Unallowed evil, felt and mourned over, should in no wise weaken this confidence: but without conscious integrity in our conduct towards God and man, such appeals would be the most impious presumption. The Lord seeth us in secret, visiteth us in the night, and witnesseth our conduct in our most secret retirement, when solitude tempts the hypocrite to sin, and when the imagination is apt to roam after forbidden objects: and if he find one indulged and allowed iniquity, he will abhor our feigned devotions. We should therefore purpose not to offend with our lips, or even in our hearts. We must not conform to the works of men, if we would escape the paths of the destroyer; for "broad is the way that leadeth to destruction, and many there be, that go in thereat." (Notes, Matt. vii. 14, 15. Rom. xii. 2. Eph. ii. 1, 2.) We must treasure up the precepts and promises of God's word in our hearts, for our direction and encouragement; and pray continually to be upheld by his grace, if we would walk in the path of holiness: for our way through this evil world is very slippery; we are weak, and apt to be heedless; and our own watchfulness or resolutions, and former upright and consistent behaviour, cannot safely be depended on. But the Lord will incline his ears to those who call upon him; he hath always magnified his loving-kindnesses to such as have trusted in him; upholding and defending them by his right hand from all their enemies; keeping them safer by his grace, than the pupil of the eye is kept by his providence; and with greater tenderness, than the hen gathereth her chickens under her wings. (Notes, Ruth ii. 11, 12. Matt. xxiii. 37-39.)—The profane, the sensual, and the proud, indeed, are at all times their enemies; yet they are not always left to take an active part against them: but Satan is their most deadly foe: he is destitute of fear and compassion, hardened in malice, and replete with subtlety; and, concerning him, we may pray in assured faith: "Arise, O LORD, disappoint him, and cast him down; deliver my soul from this wicked one." He is indeed the sword, by which the Lord punishes his enemies, and scourges a guilty world; but his children shall not be given over to be a prey to him, nor to his instruments.—The most afflicted Christian needs not envy the most prosperous "men of the world, who have their portion in this life." (Note, Luke xvi. 24-26.) They indeed receive from the Lord that abundant treasure, which they love to lay up securely for themselves; to spend in varied kinds of gratification, or hoard to aggrandize their families; and frequently the desires of their hearts in these matters are granted them. Yet they must die, and leave their good things behind them, to enter another world, where they have no portion, but darkness and despair. But the believer walks here in the light of God's countenance, in a delightful attendance on his ordinances and obedience to his commands: he rejoices in the hope of glory; when he dies, his soul departs hence "to be with Christ, which is far better;" and, at the resurrection, his body shall be raised incorruptible and glorious: and being completely changed into the image of his God and Saviour, he shall be eternally and perfectly satisfied with a happiness, large as his desires and capacities. Lord, teach us to "choose this good part, which shall never be taken from us." (Note, Luke x. 38-42. P. O.)

NOTES.

PSALM XVIII. Title. (Note, 2 Sam. xxii. 1.) V. 1. This introductory verse is not found in the parallel passage in the second book of Samuel: (2 Sam. xxii.) The variations, between the two copies, seem to have been principally poetical improvements of the style, as few of them materially alter the sense, and several evidently render the composition more elegant. Indeed, the whole psalm seems one of the most finished poetical compositions, extant in any language.—The word, here rendered, "I will love thee," is peculiarly emphatical: 'I will love thee with my inmost soul, with the most tender and fervent affections of my heart, and all that is within me.' I will greatly desire and long after thee. (Notes, lxiii. 1-4. cxvi. 1.) The experience which the aged psalmist had acquired, of the Lord's faithfulness, power, and love, no doubt excited the lively exercises of admiring, adoring complacent love as well as gratitude.—Some think that David spake, as in the person of the risen Redeemer, taking a retrospect of his sufferings and triumphs; and the words, in that view, convey a most interesting and animating reflection to the mind of true Christians.

V. 2, 3. (Note, 2 Sam. xxii. 2, 3.) 'As the psalm so evidently throughout is a thanksgiving for past deliverances, the verbs in this verse (3.) seem to require the same rendering, as that which is given to them below.' (Horne.) That is, they should be rendered in the past, and not in the future tense.—But perhaps the psalmist meant to give the feelings and purpose of his heart, while struggling with his difficulties and overcoming them by faith, to which the event corresponded; for the words are plainly future; and a total disregard to the tense should not be supposed without evident necessity. (Notes, cxlii. Title. Is. xxxviii. 9-13. Jon. ii. 1, 2.)

V. 4, 5. (Note, Sam. xxii. 5, 6.) The word, rendered "sorrows" in these verses, signifies cords or pangs, especially those of women in travail; and it is translated pangs in the Septuagint. And, as St. Luke in recording the apostle Peter's sermon on the day of Pentecost, uses the name word concerning Christ, in respect of his resurrection, where it does not seem so apposite as cords or bonds would have been; it is supposed, that he refers to the Septuagint version of this Psalm; and that this is an additional proof, that it should be considered, chiefly, as prophetic of his conflicts and triumphs. (Note, Acts ii. 22-24.)

V. 6. This verse also is future in the original. (Note, 3.) It varies from the parallel verse in Samuel, by using two nearly synonymous words for "called" and "cried," while in the other copy the latter is merely a repetition of the former.

9 <sup>a</sup>He bowed the heavens also, and came down: and <sup>b</sup>darkness was under his feet.

10 And <sup>c</sup>he rode upon a cherub, and did fly: yea, he did fly upon the wings of the wind.

11 He made darkness <sup>d</sup>his secret place; his pavilion round about him were dark waters, <sup>e</sup>and thick clouds of the skies.

12 <sup>f</sup>At the brightness that was before him his thick clouds passed, <sup>g</sup>hail-stones and coals of fire.

17 He delivered me from <sup>s</sup>my strong enemy, and from <sup>t</sup>them which hated me: for <sup>u</sup>they were too strong for me.

18 They prevented me <sup>v</sup>in the day of my calamity, <sup>w</sup>but the LORD was my stay.

19 He brought me forth also <sup>x</sup>into a large place: he delivered me, <sup>y</sup>because he delighted in me.

20 The LORD <sup>z</sup>rewarded me according to my righteousness; <sup>aa</sup>according to the cleanness of my hands hath he recompensed me.

21 For <sup>ab</sup>I have kept the ways of the LORD, <sup>ac</sup>and have not wickedly departed from my God.

22 For <sup>ad</sup>all his judgments were before me, <sup>ae</sup>and I did not put away his statutes from me.

23 I was also <sup>af</sup>upright <sup>ag</sup>before him, and <sup>ah</sup>I kept myself from mine iniquity.

24 Therefore hath <sup>ai</sup>the LORD recompensed me according to my righteousness, according to the cleanness of my hands <sup>aj</sup>in his eyesight.

25 <sup>ak</sup>With the merciful thou wilt shew thyself merciful; with an upright man <sup>al</sup>thou wilt shew thyself upright.

26 With the pure thou wilt shew thyself pure; and <sup>am</sup>with the froward thou wilt <sup>an</sup>shew thyself froward,

28 For <sup>aq</sup>thou wilt light my <sup>ar</sup>candle: the LORD <sup>as</sup>my God will enlighten my darkness.

LORD is *tried: *he is a buckler to all those that trust in him.

31 For *who is God save the LORD? or who is a rock save our God?

32 *It is God that *girdeth me with strength, *and maketh my way perfect.

33 He maketh my feet like hinds' feet, and setteth me upon *my high places.

34 *He teacheth my hands to war, *so that a bow of steel is broken by mine arms.

36 Thou hast *enlarged my steps under me, that my *feet did not slip.

37 I have *pursued mine enemies, and overtaken them: neither did I turn again till they were consumed.

38 I have *wounded them, that they were not able to rise: they are fallen under my feet.

40 Thou hast also given me *the necks of mine enemies; *that I might destroy them that hate me.

41 They cried, *but there was none to save them; even unto the LORD, but he answered them not.

50 Great deliverance giveth he *to his king; and sheweth mercy *to his anointed, to David, and to his seed for evermore.

V. 7. The words "foundations of heaven," used in Samuel, is here changed for "foundations of the hills," or mountains. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 10. Two letters in the original, nearly alike, one used in Samuel, the other here, make the variation between the two copies: and probably it was originally a trivial error of a transcriber. In Samuel it is, "He was seen upon the wings of the wind."

V. 12. The brightness of JEHOVAH's appearance dispersed the "thick clouds" which preceded it. This clause is additional. The words "coals of fire kindled," are here changed for "hailstones and coals of fire," which are also repeated in the next verse; and the marginal references shew the propriety of the allusion contained in them.

V. 15. (Note, 2 Sam. xxii. 7-16.) As the grand imagery of this passage more aptly suits the resurrection and ascension of Christ, than any of David's deliverances; (Notes, Matt. xxvii. 51-53. xxviii. 1-8. Acts i. 9-11;) so it naturally leads the pious mind to reflect on the awful descriptions given us, of the Saviour's last coming to judge the world. (Notes, 2 The. i. 5-10. 2 Pet. iii. 10-12. Rev. xx. 11-15.)

V. 16-26. (Notes, 2 Sam. xxii. 17-28) Shew thyself froward, or wrestle. (26.) The singular translation of this clause in Samuel (to which no precise idea can well be affixed,) seems to have arisen from the translator's mistaking a contraction of a word signifying to struggle, or wrestle, for a word derived from a root signifying insipid.

V. 27. The contrast between "afflicted people" and "high looks," shews, that humility rather than suffering was intended, or rather "humble sufferers." (Notes, Is. lvii. 15. Luke i. 46-55.)

V. 28, 29. (Note, 2 Sam. xxii. 29, 30.) Some apply the expression "Thou

PSALM XIX.

The heavens, (and especially the sun), proclaim the Creator's glory to all lands, 1—6. The manifold excellence and usefulness of the word of God, 7—11. David prays to be delivered from his sins, and accepted in his services, 12—14.

To the chief Musician, A Psalm of David.

THE heavens declare the glory of God; and the firmament sheweth his handywork.

2 Day unto day uttereth speech, and night unto night sheweth knowledge.

3 There is no speech nor language, where their voice is not heard.

4 Their line is gone out through all the earth, and their words to the end of the world. In them hath he set a tabernacle for the sun;

5 Which is as a bridegroom coming out of his chamber, and rejoiceth as a strong man to run a race.

6 His going forth is from the end of the heaven, and his circuit unto the ends of it: and there is nothing hid from the heat thereof.

7 The law of the LORD is perfect, converting the soul: the testimony of the LORD is sure, making wise the simple.

8 The statutes of the LORD are right, rejoicing the heart: the commandment of the LORD is pure, enlightening the eyes.

9 The fear of the LORD is clean, enduring for ever: the judgments of the LORD are true and righteous altogether.
10 More to be desired are they than gold, yea, than much fine gold: sweeter also than honey and the honeycomb.
11 Moreover, by them is thy servant warned: and in keeping of them there is great reward.
12 Who can understand his errors? cleanse thou me from secret faults.
13 Keep back thy servant also from presumptuous sins; let them not have dominion over me: then shall I be upright, and I shall be innocent from the great transgression.
14 Let the words of my mouth, and the meditation of my heart, be acceptable in thy sight, O LORD, my strength, and my redeemer.

(Note, Rom. x. 18—21.) Especially the glorious sun, who hath, as it were, his tabernacle pitched in the centre of the heavens. Thence every morning he issues forth, in all the vigour, alacrity, and beautiful adorning, with which a bridegroom would leave his chamber to go to his nuptials; and rejoices like an active racer, who glories in his strength, and anticipates the victory, when about to start for the prize. Thus he daily diffuses through the whole earth light, warmth, and fertility; and communicates, or preserves, all animal and vegetable life, and even penetrates by his piercing beams into the heart of the earth. (Notes, cxlviii. 4. Gen. i. 14—19. Deut. iv. 19.) The sun in the firmament may be considered as an emblem of "the Sun of righteousness," diffusing divine light and salvation by his gospel to the nations of the earth. He delighteth in communicating blessings to his church, which as a bridegroom he hath espoused to himself: and his course will be unwearied as that of the sun, till the whole earth be filled with his light and salvation. (Notes, lxxxiv. 11, 12. Mal. iv. 2, 3. John iii. 27—36.)

V. 7—11. The word here translated "law," may be rendered doctrine; and be understood as a general name for divine revelation, as then extended, the law of Moses being the principal part of it. The whole of this is "perfect;" (Note, Deut. xxxii. 3, 4.) and is intended to convert the soul from sin and the world, to God and holiness; or to restore man from his fallen state. By it the Lord testifies to us all those truths, which relate to the mysteries and perfections of his nature, to our own state and character, to the way of salvation, and to the eternal world; with the invitations and promises connected with them. (Notes, Ps. cxix. 111. Is. viii. 20. 1 John v. 9—12. Marg. Ref.) This "testimony is sure," and entirely to be depended on; and the ignorant and unlearned, who seem most exposed to delusion, by unreservedly and simply crediting the word of God, become wise to salvation, and learn to live a holy, useful, and happy life, in this evil world; whilst human reasonings on these subjects commonly bewilder men in error and uncertainty.—This sure testimony—preserves ignorant souls from being seduced to worship the sun; for it makes them at the first word so wise, as to understand that the Lord "created the heavens and the earth." (Bp. Patrick.)—"The statutes" frequently mean the ordinances of God, by which Israel maintained communion with him, and received all blessings from him. These, though burdensome in themselves, were entirely suited to that dispensation; and proved a source of joy to the believing worshipper. (Marg. Ref.) But some explain the word in this place, to signify the laws given to regulate the conduct of magistrates, in administering justice: which were peculiarly equitable, and tended to render the nation happy. "The commandment," or the moral law, is "holy, just, and good," and spiritual, enlightening the mind to perceive what men should be and do, and how far they are from that holiness which it demands. Thus they learn their true character, are shut up under sin and condemnation, and are brought to welcome the divine Saviour, as well as to walk in newness of life. (Notes, Ex. xx. 1. Rom. iii. 19, 20.)—"The fear of the LORD is clean," as it sets the soul against all sin, and leads to holy watchfulness and diligence; and being once truly implanted in the soul, it will endure for ever. The term also may include the worship rendered to God, according to his word; which was at that time free from all profane mixtures of superstition and idolatry, and from the vile immoralities attending the religion of the surrounding nations. The obligation to this holy worship is perpetual: but the external form was varied, when the old dispensation was superseded by the new, and a more spiritual worship appointed.—"The judgments" commonly, in the books of Moses, denote the judicial law; (Notes, Ex. xxi. 1. Deut. iv. 6—8. vi. 1.) but the term is used in various senses, in other parts of Scripture; and may include warnings, counsels, threatenings, and the instances given of Divine wrath executed on sinners in different ways.—In every sense "the judgments of God were true and righteous altogether," wilt, or dost," "light my candle," which had been extinguished, to the restoration of the Saviour from death, in which his body had lain as an extinguished taper; and the next verse, to his bursting the barriers of the tomb.

V. 30—45. (Notes, 2 Sam. xxii. 31—51.) (46—48.) 'Thus we learn to trust in JEHOVAH without fear, when our enemies are victorious; and to glorify him without reserve, when we are so.' (Horne.)

V. 49. St. Paul quotes this verse as the language of the Messiah, to prove that the gentiles would glorify God for his mercy; (Note, Rom. xv. 8—13:) and this shews, beyond a doubt, that he considered the psalm as prophetic of Christ; (Notes, xxii. 22—31:) though it is not advisable to apply every clause to him, so as to overlook his ancestor and type, who seems to have been led by the Holy Spirit, from speaking of his own conflicts and deliverances, to use language, which could never have its full accomplishment, but in its promised seed.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

In David, the type, we may here behold Jesus our Redeemer, conflicting with enemies, compassed with sorrows, and with "floods of ungodly men," (Notes, Ps. xxii. 12—18. Matt. xxvii. 39—44.) enduring not only the pains of death, but the wrath of God for us: yet calling upon the Father with strong cries and tears; rescued from the grave with a tremendous earthquake, and various convulsions of nature; advanced to the mediatorial throne, and made head of the heathen, as a recompense of his most perfect obedience, even unto death; executing vengeance on the Jewish nation, beating them as small as the dust before the wind, and casting them out as the mire in the streets; and proceeding either to reconcile, or to put under his feet, all other enemies, till death, the last enemy, shall be destroyed. (Note, 1 Cor. xv. 20—28.) In the full assurance of these truths, and expectation of his appearing and his glory, we should hasten to submit willingly to his authority, and to embrace his salvation: we should trust in his merits, rejoice in his triumphs, and imitate his example. We too should most fervently love the Lord, our strength and our salvation; we should call on him in every trouble, and praise him for every deliverance; we should aim to walk with him in all righteousness and true holiness, approving our hearts unto him, and keeping ourselves from our own iniquities. May he arm us for every conflict, and aid us in all; may we make no league with sin, or give quarter to any lust. By his strength may we leap over every interposing wall of difficulty; by his light may we pass through every dark valley; till at length we share the Saviour's resurrection and ascension into heaven: for if we belong unto him, he conquered and reigns for us, and we shall conquer and reign through him: and partake of the mercy of our anointed King, which is entailed on all his seed for evermore.

NOTES.

PSALM XIX. V. 1. This psalm seems especially to have been intended to prove, that the idolatry and irreligion of mankind were wholly inexcusable. Even the Gentiles, to the remotest regions of the earth, were shewn the glory of God, by the heavens and the heavenly orbs, the benefit of which they received; though they forgot the Creator: but Israel had fuller instructions from the sacred oracles. (Notes, Is. xl. 22—26. Jer. x. 11—15. Rom. i. 18—23.)

V. 2. The day and night, in constant rotation, instruct mankind in the knowledge of the glorious Creator; and each day and night, as it were, transmits this task to its successor; or they answer to each other, as when men sing in parts, alternately.

V. 3—6. The luminaries of heaven are not capable of articulate discourse, as man is, (which seems to be intimated by the abruptness of the original,) "No speech, no language, their voice is not heard;" yet their instructions may be understood by every nation under heaven: and whilst other teachers are confined to some particular district, they preach to the whole human race.

without the least exception in any one particular. (Marg. Ref.)—Indeed, the sacred word, (even as David had it,) was in his judgment more valuable, because more useful, than much fine gold: and he found it more pleasant than honey to his taste.—He loved the Scriptures, especially because they warned him to avoid sins and temptations; nay, the observance of them was its own abundant recompense; though it likewise entitled him to a gracious reward, which he had richly experienced. (Notes, cxix. 97—105. Jam. i. 22—25.)

V. 12—14. From the consideration of the word of God, David's thoughts recurred to himself. Viewed in this glass, his errors or deviations, appeared innumerable: and he exclaimed, "Who can understand his errors?" Who can know, or find out, or recollect, all his failures of conformity to this perfect rule? He, therefore, not only desired to be pardoned, and cleansed from those sins, which he had discovered and confessed, but also from such as he had forgotten or overlooked: for, by "secret faults," he evidently meant the transgressions which had escaped his own notice, or vanished from his memory; and not those which had been kept secret from human observation. The treachery of his heart likewise appeared to him so great, that he feared being drawn aside into deliberate and presumptuous sins, the result of proud contempt of God, and being brought under the dominion of some powerful lust: and this dictated a fervent prayer to be kept back by divine grace from such dreadful crimes and consequences. (Notes, Num. xv. 30—36.) In this way he hoped to be preserved upright and innocent from the great offence of rebellion, idolatry, or apostasy: and he earnestly intreated that the words of his mouth, and the meditation of his heart, might, by divine grace, be rendered such as it behoved God to accept, and as might obtain a merciful acceptance in his sight, whom he entitled "his Strength, and Redeemer." (Notes, Lev. xxv. 25—28. Job xix. 23—37.) His dependence therefore was entirely the same with that of every Christian, who says, "Surely in the Lord Jesus have I righteousness and strength."

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The heavens so declare the glory of God and proclaim his wisdom, power, and goodness, that atheists, infidels, idolaters, and all ungodly men, will be for ever left without excuse. Indeed; we may all learn profitable lessons from these constant teachers, who instruct, by day and night, men in every clime, and of every tongue. By considering these inanimate servants of our Creator, we may learn to adore his magnificence and liberality; we may be stirred up to cheerfulness, constancy, and diligence in doing good; and led to use our nobler gifts of reason and speech to proclaim his praise.—The transition is thence easy and natural, to the contemplation of the Sun of righteousness, the Bridegroom of the church, and Light of the world. Whilst we walk in his holy light and consolations, and are made fruitful in good works by his genial influence; we should long and pray for that time, when he shall enlighten, cheer, and fructify every nation on earth with his blessed salvation. He shines upon us through his word; may he send forth numbers to publish it! Where that is truly received, "it converteth the soul" from sin to God. May we heartily believe his "sure testimony," and imbibe heavenly wisdom from this pure and inexhaustible Fountain: may we rejoice in attending on all his ordinances; and thus receive communications of light, grace, strength, and consolation from the fulness of Christ, and render to the Lord the glory due unto his name. May we study and understand his enlightening commandments; examining ourselves by them, and walking with delight according to their holy instructions, whilst we embrace and daily plead the precious promises before our God. May his pure and purifying fear, which endureth for ever, be deeply grafted in our hearts, that we may stand in awe of his righteous judgments, and be warned from every evil way; that we may flee for refuge to his gracious salvation, and have our consciences directed and our hearts encouraged by every part of his sacred word. Then shall we prize our Bibles more than all manner of riches, and find more delight in them than in all the pleasures of sense: being guided by them into that happy path, which leads to still more complete felicity in the eternal world.—But let it be observed, that the more any man studies and understands the holy Scriptures, the more deeply will he be convinced of his own sinfulness, in thought, word, and deed: serious and frequent self-examination by this faithful mirror, will discover to him innumerable deviations from his perfect rule; and convince him that those, which have escaped his recollection or observation, are equally innumerable. This will induce him to cast himself unreservedly upon the mercy and grace of God, for deliverance from those sins which have been hitherto unnoticed by himself, or vanished from his recollection. He will also grow more jealous of his own heart, and afraid of temptation, lest he should be drawn into presumptuous sins, and come under the dominion of them: and whilst he longs, more and more, to be preserved from every transgression, and that his thoughts, words, and works may be acceptable to the Lord; he will feel more sensibly his own insufficiency for every good thing, and learn to depend more entirely upon Christ Jesus, as "made of God unto him, wisdom, righteousness, sanctification, and redemption;" and "to rejoice and glory in him alone." (Note, 1 Cor. i. 26—31.)

NOTES.

PSALM XX. V. 1, 2. This psalm was doubtless composed, and publicly sung, when David was about to engage in some perilous expedition; it is generally thought, in that against the Ammonites and Syrians. (Notes, 2 Sam. x. 1 Chr. xix.) The congregation of Israel thus prayed for the protection and success of their anointed king, to "the God of Jacob," to that God who heard the patriarch in his distress, and was still the God of his posterity. (Note, Gen. xxxii. 28.) Among them he had fixed his sanctuary, and the ark of the covenant, which had lately been removed to mount Zion; and from him, the great object of their worship, as manifesting his glory above the mercy-seat, they sought help and victory. David was a type of Christ, in his conflicts and victories: and the psalm may be applied as a prayer of the ancient church for his coming, and of the Christian church, for the completion of his work, and the establishment of his kingdom, and its enlargement and prosperity.

V. 3. The oblations at the sanctuary, when presented in humble faith and love, were graciously accepted, as typical of the Redeemer's atoning sacrifice: and the answer, by fire from heaven consuming the victims, was the most decisive proof of this acceptance. "Turn to ashes thy burnt-offering." (Notes, Gen. iv. 3—5. Lev. ix. 24. 1 Kings xviii. 38, 39. 2 Chr. vi. 1—3.)—David's burnt-offering, afterwards, was thus consumed. (Note, 1 Chr. xxi. 26.)

V. 4. David earnestly desired to promote the honour of God, and the welfare of Israel, in his counsels and undertakings; and it was proper for the people to pray for him in this expressive language. In respect of the designs of our great Redeemer, the words may be adopted in the most unreserved manner; but seldom in respect of other kings or princes.

V. 5. The king of Israel was their anointed deliverer; and when they went forth to war under his command, they might properly set up their banners in the name of the Lord, as well as "rejoice in his salvation."—"In confidence of thy help, we will shout when we set on our enemies: for the Lord will not fail to grant the petitions of our sovereign, whose cause is so just, and who has been so insolently treated." (Bp. Patrick.)

V. 6—8. David himself seems here to speak. His past deliverances and victories, and the loyal zeal of his people, assured him of success, from the power of Israel's God. Comparing the confidence of his enemies in chariots and horses, and well-appointed numerous troops, with his own reliance, and that of his people, on the Almighty; he anticipated the triumph, and exulted as if already victorious. His anointed. (6.) "His Messiah." David, as anointed to be king of Israel, typified the Lord Jesus Christ.

V. 9. "Let the King of heaven hear, whilst we pray for his anointed on earth."—Or the clause may be rendered, "O Lord, save the king: he shall hear us when we call."

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

No rank or character can exempt man from trouble; but the Lord will hear the prayers of the afflicted, and will support and deliver them. They, who pray most fervently for themselves, put the greatest value on the prayers of others; and are encouraged by them in further calling upon God. His "name," his glorious perfections, (Notes, Ex. xxxiv. 5—7. Prov. xviii. 10, 11. Matt. xxviii. 18—20,) will be a sure defence to all who, like Jacob, trust him, and apply to him in their distress: but we should observe, that all our help comes out of Zion, from the mercy-seat, and through the accepted sacrifice of our Emmanuel, which all the legal burnt-offerings shadowed forth.—As far as our desires are spiritual, and our counsels holy, we may hope to have them granted and fulfilled; but it would be ruinous to have our sinful inclinations indulged.—Fervent united prayers tend much to the joyful assurance of faith and hope: and it is the first step to victory, in our spiritual warfare, to renounce all carnal confidences, and to trust only in the mercy and grace of God: thus we shall arise from our depth of misery, and obtain establishment; whilst all who trust in themselves will soon be brought down.—Happy is it for that people, whose rulers are influenced, in all their measures, by the faith and fear of God, aiming at his glory and the public good: when they value the prayers of true Christians, and act with such justice, that pious men can unreservedly pray for their success: when they set up their banners in the name of God; and place their confidence, not in fleets and armies, but in his powerful protection. "From his holy heaven he will save, with the strength of his right hand, such as thus trust in him."—It is our duty to pray for our rulers, that they may be like David: we have great cause for thankfulness for our peculiar advantages in this respect: and we should continually intreat the Lord, that they who are or shall be placed over us, may be directed and prospered in every undertaking, for the honour of God, the peace and welfare of the land, and the common benefit of mankind.—

PSALM XXI.

The king and people rejoice in God, and bless him for fully answering their largest prayers, 1-6: expressing the strongest assurance of future success, with the ruin of all enemies, 7-12: and calling upon God to exalt himself, that they might more and more sing his praises, 13.

In answer to the hopes and prayers of the old-testament church, the anointed King of God's people came in the appointed season: he was heard in the day of his trouble; his sacrifice was accepted; his intercessions have prevailed; his kingdom hath been set up, and we are called to partake of its blessings. Thanksgivings for these benefits should be constantly rendered. In "his salvation let us rejoice," under him let us enlist, and in his name set up our banners. But we should recollect, that we belong to a large army; and we should not only seek and rejoice in hope of personal triumphs; but pray for the success of the common cause; and look for the accomplishment of the Redeemer's whole counsel, when his dominion over willing subjects shall be extended throughout the earth.

NOTES.

PSALM XXI. V. 1. The former psalm was the prayer of Israel for David, and of the church for the Messiah; and this is a song of praise to God, who had answered those prayers. Several circumstances of the psalm may be accommodated to the case of David. Yet the whole seems more immediately intended for Christ and his kingdom.—Many of the Hebrews themselves apply it to the Messiah. So that it may be called a psalm of triumph after the victories which David got over his enemies, which were a type of Christ's victory over death, and of the triumph that ensued. And truly there are some things in it, which are more literally fulfilled in Christ than in David. (Bp. Patrick.)—David had risen to great authority: but he exulted and rejoiced in the strength and power of God, which had wrought many and great deliverances for him; and had made him the deliverer of Israel from all enemies, and was engaged for his eternal salvation.—Thus our Lord, being raised from the dead, entered on the "joy set before him;" which includes the salvation of his people, to the glory of God the Father, as well as his own exaltation to the mediatorial throne. (Note, Heb. xii. 2, 3.)

V. 2-5. God had, on all occasions, answered the prayers of his servant David; had prevented him by anointing him to be king, before he had thought of such an honour; and had made him successful and distinguished beyond his largest hopes. The Lord had not only very often preserved his life, in answer to his prayers, when in the most imminent danger; but had given him the assurance of continuing the kingdom in his family for many generations, and in Christ, as his descendant for ever, and he was encouraged personally to expect everlasting life in heaven. Thus his glory was in all respects "great in God's salvation."—Yet the passage, in its fullest import, can only be accomplished in Christ himself.—"Thou shalt prevent," &c. (3.) This may be considered as the language of prophecy.

V. 6, 7. The marginal rendering, "Thou hast set him to be blessings for evermore," is the most literal, and suggests another important thought on the subject. David was set to be blessings, not only to his own generation, and to his posterity, and to Israel for many ages; but, by these divine poems, to the whole church, while the world shall endure; and in Christ, his Son, to all eternity: and thus he was placed to be blessed, or praised, for evermore, as some render the clause. (Note, Gen. xii. 1-3.)—David also enjoyed great felicity in the favour of God; and, trusting in his mercy, could not be moved, either in respect of his authority or his personal salvation. But the glory and dominion of Christ, to the praise of the glory of divine grace, are beyond the reach of all his enemies, and those of his church; and he especially "is set for blessings for evermore." (Notes, lxxii. 17-19. Acts ii. 22-26. Eph. i. 3-8.)

V. 8-12. These verses indicate, that the haters and opposers of Israel's anointed king were likewise the enemies of God; who would assuredly take vengeance on them, and their posterity, in the most awful manner, making them the butt of his severest displeasure. (Notes, ii. 1-9.) But they may be considered as addressed to the Messiah himself; and no doubt, they receive their fullest accomplishment, in the judgments inflicted on the opposers and

PSALM XXII.

David, prophetically speaking in the person of Christ, complains grievously, that he was forsaken by his God, and left to the insulting cruelty of his enemies, and predicts many circumstances of his sufferings, 1-21. He proclaims the name and praise of the Lord, calling on the people to trust and glorify him; and foretells the permanent success of the gospel, 22-31.

To the chief Musician upon *Ajeleth Shahar, A Psalm of David.

despisers of his authority and gospel. (Marg. Ref. Notes, cx. 1. 5, 6. Luke xix. 11-27. 1 Cor. xv. 20-28. 2 Thes. i. 5-10. Rev. xx. 11-15.)

V. 13. Both the prosperity of the church, and the ruin of its enemies, tend to exalt God, or to render his glory conspicuous to his rational creatures. These effects can only be produced by his omnipotence; which his people unitedly pray to see displayed, that they may joyfully celebrate his praises.—This conclusion greatly resembles the first petitions, and closing doxology, of the Lord's prayer. (Notes, Matt. vi. 9, 10, 13.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

If David rejoiced greatly in the honour conferred on him, as king of Israel; what is the joy of our Redeemer in his exaltation to the mediatorial throne, and in the salvation of his people! (Note, Heb. xii. 2, 3.) And if Israel, from love to David and his auspicious government, rejoiced, and praised God for him, how great should be our joy and praise, to behold by faith our brother and friend thus glorified, and for all the blessings which we may expect from him! The Father was as ready to grant, as his beloved Son to ask, when he desired to be crowned, not with gold, but with glory and honour, and to have all things put under his feet; and to possess an unchangeable kingdom, for the benefit of his church: nay, our God "prevents" us sinners "with the blessings of his goodness;" and if we ask, he will give us "a crown of glory that fadeth not away," and "long life, even for ever and ever;" and the requests of the Saviour's lips are not withheld, whilst sinners are converted and believers established through his intercession. Words cannot express his glory in God's salvation, the honour and majesty which are laid upon him, and the adoration which is rendered to him by angels and saints above: yet he chiefly delights in his exalted state, as enabling him to confer "an exceeding and eternal weight of glory," on poor sinners, who here trust and love him. For, being made most blessed himself for ever, he is constituted to be the source of blessings, and "the author of eternal salvation, to all them that obey him."—His kingdom is fixed on an immovable basis, upheld by the power of God; and the exercise of the mercy of the Most High forms its grand object. But how will they escape, who are enemies to this glorious King and Saviour? The Jewish nation soon experienced the dreadful effects of his slighted love; and the condition of their posterity, from the siege and sack of Jerusalem to this day, awfully warns every one, not to entail miseries on his descendants, and bring destruction on himself, by opposing the Redeemer's kingdom, or neglecting his salvation. The discoveries, however, which will be made, and the vengeance which will be executed, at the day of judgment, on every enemy of Christ, will form the most tremendous comment on this psalm. In that day of his anger, all who hate him will be made as the fiery oven; they will be swallowed up and devoured; their devices will end in everlasting disappointment and despair; and all the arrows of the Almighty will be prepared, to execute his righteous vengeance upon them. May he then exalt himself by his efficacious grace in our hearts, destroying all the strongholds of sin and Satan; and may he "by his own strength," set up his kingdom upon earth, and exalt himself above every heathen, Jewish, and antichristian opposer: so will we, so will his whole church, sing and praise his power, which only doeth wondrous things; as an anticipation of the joy and songs of the redeemed, when they shall see the last enemy put under the Redeemer's feet.

NOTES.

PSALM XXII. Title. "Ajeleth Shahar," signifies the hind of the morning, (Marg.) and various conjectures have been made concerning the intention of this singular title. Some think it merely a musical term; and others suppose it refers to the time when it was to be sung, rendering it "the first dawn." Others apply it to Christ, as the Light of the world, whose rising was predicted.—But perhaps it points out the Saviour, marked by Satan from his birth for persecution, as the hind or hart is in the morning for chase; and so hunted

2 O my God, I cry in the day-time, but thou hearest not; and in the night-season, and am not silent.

3 But thou art holy, O thou that inhabitest the praises of Israel.

4 Our fathers trusted in thee: they trusted, and thou didst deliver them.

5 They cried unto thee, and were delivered: they trusted in thee, and were not confounded.

6 But I am a worm, and no man; a reproach of men, and despised of the people.

7 All they that see me laugh me to scorn: they shoot out the lip, they shake the head, saying,

8 He trusted on the LORD, that he would deliver him: let him deliver him, seeing he delighted in him.

9 But thou art he that took me out of the womb: thou didst make me hope when I was upon my mother's breasts.

10 I was cast upon thee from the womb: thou art my God from my mother's belly.

11 Be not far from me; for trouble is near, for there is none to help.

down by his enemies, until he was surrounded by them, (as dogs surround the weary hart,) when he hung upon the cross. (Notes, 16-18. Matt. ii. 13-18. xxvii. 39-44. Luke xi. 53, 54. Acts iv. 23-28.) Of this the persecutions of David in his earlier years were a type.

V. 1. The first clause of this verse is exactly of the same import with the words used by our Lord on the cross. (Note, Matt. xxvii. 46.) The Hebrew verb indeed is changed in this exclamation for one supposed to be Syriac; but the Evangelist's interpretation is given in the very words of the Septuagint. No reasonable doubt can be made, but that he should be considered as the speaker, throughout this whole prophetic psalm. It may even be questioned, whether David had any reference to his own case in it; as every thing is applicable to Christ, and most things utterly inapplicable to David.—Whilst the man Jesus, without any personal transgression or defilement, but bearing our sins in their guilt and punishment, was wholly deprived of all sensible comfort, and felt that horror in his soul which is the effect of the Divine wrath; whilst the powers of darkness were permitted to assail him with every dreadful temptation; and whilst wicked men unrestrainedly exercised their cruel malice towards him; his God and Father seemed to have forsaken him, and to stand at a distance from his salvation, as regardless of his agonies and prayers. Yet still he used the language of vigorous faith, conflicting with, and prevailing against, all despondency and impatience.—(Notes, Gen. iii. 14, 15. Matt. xxvi. 36-39. Mark xiv. 36. xv. 34-39. Luke xxii. 47-53.) The abruptness of the latter part is remarkable.—“Far from my salvation.” (Marg.)—“the words of my roaring.”—How can this be?

V. 2. The Lord Jesus continued whole nights in prayer; he arose a great while before day for that purpose; and in the cold dark night he prostrated himself in the garden, and “prayed most earnestly:” yet did not the cup of his sufferings for sinners pass from him! He felt a natural reluctance to such tremendous sorrows; but his zeal and love prevailed, and when he added, “Not my will, but thine be done,” he, as it were, retracted his former petition.—The prophecy expresses the feelings of his soul in the extremity of his suffering; yet his supplications were heard, as it soon appeared in his resurrection. (Notes, John xvii. 1-3. Heb. v. 7-10.)

V. 3. This verse seems to be admirably expressive of perfect resignation under the severest sufferings, which peculiarly accords with the prophetic meaning.—“Thou hearest not.”—Shall I then murmur, or impeach thy faithfulness? Far from it. Thou, nevertheless, continuest holy, &c. Thus our Lord, on the cross, declared the holiness of God in his sharpest sufferings: nay, he declared them to be a demonstration of it; for which he would be continually praised by Israel, more than for all the other deliverances, that they had received in answer to their faith and prayer: and he considered all those as types and earnest of his own deliverance, when he had completed his expiation.—In Israel, in the church exclusively, the works and perfections of God are celebrated.

V. 4-6. (Marg. Ref.) Worm, &c. (6.) The Saviour here spake of the extremely abject state, to which he was reduced; in which he was treated as a worm, and patiently submitted to it; being humble, silent, and harmless, when oppressed and trodden under foot.—The language is extremely expressive of the contempt with which he was treated by all ranks and orders of men, whether Jews or Gentiles. (Notes. Is. xlix. 7, 8. lili. 2, 3. Zech. xi. 7-9. 12-14. Luke xxiii. 6-12.)

V. 7, 8. The history of our Lord's sufferings is the best comment on this part of the prophecy: the language of the former verse might be thought historical of the insults attending his crucifixion; and that of the latter was adopted, without any variation at all affecting the sense, by the chief priests and rulers, to express their contempt of him, when hanging upon the cross. Little did they think, that the Spirit of prophecy, a thousand years before, had foretold that the murderers of the Messiah would speak of him in this insulting and impious manner. (Notes, Job xvi. 4-16. xxx. 1-14. Matt. xxvi. 63-68. xxvii. 27-31. 39-44.)

V. 9, 10. David seems early to have devoted himself to God, but Jesus alone was a “holy child,” born without sin. (Notes, lxxi. 17, 18. Is. vii. 15. Luke i. 34-38. ii. 41-52.) He was not only the peculiar care of Providence from his birth, but from his earliest infancy he exercised the most perfect faith, hope, and love towards his God and Father.

V. 11-13. A helpless infant or a harmless lamb, surrounded by furious bulls and hungry fierce lions, aptly represented the Saviour surrounded with his insulting and bloody persecutors; and in his extreme distress forsaken even by his disciples. (Notes, 16-18. Matt. xxvi. 40-56. Luke xxiii. 1-5. John xvi. 31-33. xvii. 1-3.) Gaped, (13.) or, opened, (Marg.) as a lion to devour the prey.—The bulls, which fed in the fertile pastures of Bashan, were remarkably fat, strong, and furious; and they represented the Jewish rulers, who were rendered insolent by prosperity.

V. 14, 15. The dissolution of nature, and the unresisting sufferings of Christ, when “crucified in weakness” (Note, 2 Cor. xiii. 1-4.) are expressed by his being poured out as water: the stretching of his body on the cross, and the violent motion with which it was erected, shook his body even to the dislocation of his bones. (Note, Matt. xxvii. 35.) His sense of the Divine wrath against our sins, then laid upon him, and his inward anguish, made his heart faint and melt within him, as wax by the fire. Thus the vigour and moisture of his body were dried up, as with intense heat: his extreme thirst caused his tongue to cleave to his jaws; and he was brought down into the dust, by his death and burial. (Note, Matt. xxvii. 47-50, 57-61, Luke xxii. 44.)

V. 16-18. The rulers of the Jews were as strong bulls: the multitudes and soldiers were as so many ravenous dogs, who had enclosed this hunted hind, in order to glut themselves with his sufferings and his blood. (Note, Title.) Our Lord here setteth himself forth, under the image of an hart, or hind, roused early in the morning of his mortal life; hunted and chased all the day, and in the evening pulled down to the ground. (Horne.) (Note, Is. lvi. 9-12.)—In nailing him to the cross, they pierced his hands and his feet; and when, emaciated by his labours and sufferings, he was stretched out almost naked on the cross, he might have numbered all his bones. The insulting multitudes stood around, and gratified their malice and curiosity by staring upon him; and the unfeeling soldiers having shared his other garments, amused themselves with casting lots for his vesture. The manner in which his clothes were disposed of, being very remarkable, and occasioned by the peculiar texture of his coat, was thus circumstantially predicted! (Notes, Matt. xxvii. 35-44. John xix. 23, 24.)—Crucifixion, or nailing men to two transverse pieces of wood, by spikes driven through their hands and feet, seems to have been originally a Grecian or Roman punishment for slaves; at least it was not known in Judea, till many ages after this prophecy was delivered. Nothing, at all answering to the literal meaning of these terms, befell David, as far as we know: nothing could have been previously more unlikely, than that the promised and glorious Son of David should be treated in this cruel and ignominious manner: yet the fulfilment was so exact, that the verses seem more like a narrative than a prediction.—The clause, indeed, rendered, “They pierced my hands and my feet,” stands in the original at present, As a lion my hands “and my feet.” But this contains no clear sense at all. A very trivial change gives the reading of our version. The Septuagint which is certainly more ancient than the Christian era, renders it as we do; and there seems scarcely the shadow of a doubt, but this is the genuine reading: though the general exactness of the Jews in preserving their Scriptures, precludes the charge of an intentional alteration.—Let any thinking man recollect, that the Jews, the greatest opposers of Christianity ever since its promulgation, have unanimously allowed, that David wrote this psalm above a thousand years before the birth of Christ; then let him compare it with the history of his crucifixion, and determine, whether it does not stand as an irrefragable argument of the divine inspiration of the Scriptures, and of the divine original of the Christian religion.

V. 19-21. In these verses, the psalmist, (speaking in the person of the suffering Redeemer,) having stated the extremity of his case, renews his supplications; and earnestly prays to be delivered from the sword of divine justice, stretched forth against him, as our surety; from Satan, the chief of those blood-hounds or roaring lions, which pursued him; and from the enraged enemies, who, like the fiercest wild beasts, surrounded him, as if they aimed at his entire and final destruction.—The word rendered "my darling," signifies my united one, or my desolate one. It is the feminine of the noun, rendered elsewhere "only son," or only-begotten son; and thus the Septuagint translate it. (Note, xxxv. 17-19.)—Some think it refers to the human nature of Christ, as united to the Deity.

V. 22. This verse is expressly applied to our Lord by the apostle: (Note Heb. ii. 10-13;) and the subsequent part of the psalm is as evidently prophetic of his glory and the success of his gospel, as the foregoing part is of his sufferings.—The transition from the one part to the other, and indeed the whole, is allowed to be highly poetical. For here the scene at once changes and brightens. The Saviour turns his eyes from his sufferings, to the glory which followed: (Notes, John xiii. 1-5. 31-35. xvii. 1-3;) and, anticipating the extensive and permanently blessed effects of his passion and exaltation, he breaks forth into exulting predictions and praises at the prospect. So that what follows seems descriptive of his feelings when he cried, "It is finished," and "Father into thy hands I commend my spirit." (Notes, Luke xxiii. 44-49. John xix. 28-30.)

V. 23, 24. Some expositors think that these verses are the song of praise, which the Messiah declares he will lead in the midst of the congregation. Israel is specially addressed, but all who are favoured with the gospel are equally concerned in the exhortation: as the resurrection and consequent glory of Christ are the common benefit of all that fear and seek God: for had he despised and rejected the surety's sufferings, and left him in the grave, all the hopes of sinners would have been for ever buried with him. (Notes, 2. Rom. iv. 23-25. viii. 32-34. 1 Cor. xv. 12-18. Heb. xiii. 20, 21.) But, though man despised and abhorred him, and the Father for a time seemed to disregard his sufferings and prayers; and though the character of those whom he represented, was abominable in the sight of God; he yet accepted the Saviour's atoning sacrifice, raised him from the dead, and made him "the author of eternal salvation to all them that obey him." (Note, Heb. v. 7-10.)

V. 25. Vows, &c. That is, the Saviour will publicly fulfil all the engagements of his exaltation, for the glory of God, and the benefit of his church; even as the psalmist offered the various sacrifices, which he had vowed in his distress. (Notes, lvi. 12. lxxvi. 13, 14. cxvi. 14-19.)—The change in the person, from thee to him, is not uncommon. (27. Prov. i. 26-28.)

V. 26. The death of Christ was the great sacrifice for sin; his "flesh is meat indeed, and his blood drink indeed;" the poor in spirit feed on this provision, in their hearts by faith, and are satisfied: thus whilst they seek the Lord, they praise him also, and their hearts, or souls, are preserved unto eternal life. (Notes, John vi. 30-35. 47-58.)—The sacred feasts on the peace-offerings and vows, at the sanctuary, furnished this allusion.

V. 27, 28. The fallen race of Adam, in general, all over the world, had forgotten, through alienation of heart, the one living and true God, and their relations and obligations to him, as their Creator, Governor, and judge: but, through the sufferings of Christ, and the glory that followed, vast multitudes in the most distant nations "remembered" God; and, forsaking their idols and iniquities, turned to him, as his worshippers and subjects. Thus the kingdom of God, which always was his by right, began in fact to be established among the nations: but this part of the prophecy has, by no means, yet received its grand accomplishment. (Notes, Rev. xi. 15-18. xx. 1-3.)

V. 29. Even the rich and powerful on earth are invited to this feast, and must feed on this spiritual provision, or they must starve: they must worship, and submit to the exalted Saviour, or perish: they, that persist in their rebellion, must bow as condemned criminals before his tribunal. The most exalted, and the most abased, in this respect, are precisely in the same situation; none can preserve his body from death, or raise it again from the dust; none can quicken his own soul, or save it from final condemnation. In both respects,

Christ alone is "the resurrection and the life," and at length all that sleep in the dust must bow before his tribunal, and all his believing subjects will enter into his joy. (Notes, John v. 28, 29. xi. 25, 26.)

V. 30, 31. Some in every age will be the servants of Christ: they shall be accounted, or registered, as a chosen generation to the Lord; (Note, 1 Pet. ii. 9, 10;) and shall supplant the Jewish nation, though not descended from one common stock, being the children of God by a spiritual birth. (Is. lxxi. 7-9. 1 Pet. i. 19-25.) They shall come from every quarter to enlarge the church; one generation shall declare to another his righteousness and salvation; and his atoning death, and consequent glory, shall be their favourite topics. (Notes, Is. xlv. 21-25. Rom. i. 17. iii. 21-26. 2 Cor. v. 18-21.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1-21. The stupendous scene here exhibited should attract our most serious and affectionate attention. Let us, therefore, step aside from worldly trifles, to "behold the Lamb of God, that taketh away the sin of the world." Let us contemplate the depth of the Saviour's humiliation in connexion with his personal dignity; and his intense sufferings contrasted with the infinite delight which the Father had in him, and the combination of all excellencies in his character. Let us hearken to his complaints and groans; let us attend to his strong crying and tears; his agony and temptations, and the cruelty and contempt with which he was treated by Jews and gentiles, priests, rulers, people, and soldiers; till ingenuity was exhausted, and malice itself fatigued, with mocking and tormenting him. Let us view this holy Saviour, surrounded by bulls, lions, and ravenous dogs; in the palace of the high priest, in Herod's, and in Pilate's, judgment-hall. Let us next look to him as nailed to the cross, pouring out his blood like water; enquiring in doleful accents, "My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?" and complaining, "All my bones are out of joint, my heart is as wax, it is melted in the midst of my bowels;" till at length his death closed the awful scene, whilst nature also seemed expiring in convulsions. (Note, Matt. xxvii. 51-53.) What then do we learn from these astonishing events, and this extraordinary prediction of them? Here we behold the eternal justice and holiness of our God; the immutable excellency and obligation of his law; the inconceivable odiousness and guilt of sin; the inestimable worth of our souls; the ruined state of man, the insufficiency of all other expedients or magnifying the law, or satisfying the justice, of God; the vanity of the world, and the misery of its deluded inhabitants; the dire malignity of the human heart, which naturally conceived and expressed such cruel hatred and contempt of him, who was "the brightness of the Father's glory, and the express image of his person;" the infinitely free love and compassion of God the Father, and of our Lord Jesus Christ, for us wretched sinners; the foundation of every human hope; the source of all grace and consolation; the exemplar to which we are to be conformed, the treatment that we are to expect from man, and the conduct under it which, as Christians, we are to adopt. In short, the whole system of true religion is here viewed in its central point; and every lesson is learned, with peculiar advantage, by the enlightened and humbled soul.

V. 22-31. In this part of the psalm, viewed in connexion with the former, we behold the ransom accepted, the Saviour heard, and raised, and exalted to his glorious throne: we view him at the right hand of the Father, receiving inestimable gifts to bestow on sinful man, and not ashamed to call his poor disciples brethren; declaring among them, and by them to the world, the name and truths of God; fulfilling in his exaltation the design of all his sufferings; and calling on all, that fear and seek the Lord, to rejoice in, to praise, and glorify him. (Note, Heb. ii. 10-13.) He now gives us his flesh and blood, to be the life-giving and preserving food of our souls: on this the meek and humble feed with delight, praise the Lord for it, and live for ever; and all, however powerful and honourable, who refuse this provision, and will not worship the exalted Saviour, must perish: for "the kingdom is the Lord's," and the once crucified Jesus is "the governor among the nations;" and "no man can" by any means "keep alive his own soul." Whilst numbers despise, and wonder, and perish; from age to age a seed is raised up to serve the Redeemer, who are "accounted to the Lord for a chosen generation;" and who declare his righteousness and works of love, to those who surround, and those that shall succeed them. Thus the gentiles have been brought into his church, which is preserved in the midst of opposition: and ere long "all the ends of the earth shall remember, and turn unto the Lord, and all the kindreds of the nations shall worship before him."—Let the infidel then study this psalm with serious attention, and no longer object his futile cavils, in opposition to demonstration. Let those who go about to establish their own righteousness, enquire why the beloved Son of God thus suffered, if their performances could atone for sin, or recommend a sinner to his offended God. Let the antinomian consider, whether the Saviour thus honoured the divine law, to purchase him the liberty of despising it. Let the careless take warning to flee from the wrath to come; and the trembling be encouraged, and rest their hopes upon this merciful Redeemer. The tempted and distressed believer should contemplate the scene, and learn to imitate the faith, patience, meekness, constancy, persevering prayers, fervent zeal, and love of the suffering Saviour; and cheerfully expect a happy event of every trial. Finally, let us never be ashamed to profess our faith in him and obligations to him, who condescends to own us as his brethren; but instruct our families in the important truths of his gospel, desiring above all things, and praying continually, that "they may be a seed to serve him;" and that all the ends of the earth may hear and receive his gospel, and become his believing and accepted servants and worshippers.

NOTES.

PSALM XXIII. V. 1-3. The preceding psalm represented "the good Shepherd laying down his life for the sheep," and assuming his pastoral charge: this describes their safety and felicity under his tender care. (Notes. John x. 1-18. 26-31.) For as Christ is "the good," "the great," "the chief shepherd;" we cannot doubt but he is Jehovah, and is especially intended. (Notes. lxxx. 1. Is. xli. 9-11. Zech. xiii. 7. Acts xx. 28. Heb. xiii. 20, 21. 1 Pet. v. 1-4.)—A flock of sheep, gentle, harmless, and valuable, feeding in verdant pastures, or reclining, cheerful and satisfied, by gentle rivulets, under the care of a skilful, vigilant, and tender shepherd, forms the emblem of believers, brought back to the Shepherd of their souls, and by him guarded and provided for. (Notes. Luke xii. 24-32. 1 Pet. ii. 18-25.) He is Jehovah, the omnipresent, omniscient, almighty God, one with the Father, and every way able and willing to take care of them. His ordinances are their plenteous pastures, the consolations of his Holy Spirit are their refreshing waters. They are thus guided by their Shepherd into communion with God, and find rest to their souls. If they wander, he restores them by his kind rebukes, and his effectual grace; when their souls are diseased, he, as their physician, recovers their health and vigour; and for the honour of his gospel, and the glory of his name, he leads them in the paths of righteousness. (Notes. Prov. viii. 20.)

V. 4. Betwixt that part of the flock which is on earth, and that which is gone to heaven, death lies, like a deep valley, that must be passed in going from the one to the other. But this valley cannot hurt believers, and should not alarm them. It is, indeed, deep and dark, but fruitful. The good Shepherd will accompany his sheep through it, by his gracious presence: his rod, the token of his power, (Note. ex. 2.) will defend them from the assaults of their enemies; his pastoral staff, his word of promise and spirit of grace, will support them with inward strength; and thus he will render death safe and comfortable to them. (Notes. John xiv. 2, 3. Acts vii. 54-60.)—With me, &c. (Is. xli. 10-14. xlii. 1, 2. Matt. i. 22, xxviii. 19, 20.)

V. 5, 6. The people of God feast at his table on the provisions of his love; (Notes. xxii. 26. 29;) nor can satan and wicked men, who hate and envy them, destroy their comforts, whilst they are anointed with the unction of the Holy Spirit, and drink of the cup of salvation, ever full and running over. Past experience teaches them to trust, "that the goodness and mercy of God will follow them all the days of their life." It is their desire, expectation, and determination to seek their happiness in the service of God here, and they hope to enjoy his love, without enemy or interruption, for length of days, even for ever in heaven hereafter.—The images in these verses are taken from feasts, and the general customs of anointing the guests, and distinguishing such as were most favoured by the largest portions. (Gen. xliii. 34.) Under these images both temporal provisions and spiritual comforts seem to be included.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

Experimental piety is the source of the purest, strongest comforts, and the most unshaken confidence: and cheerfulness greatly adorns and recommends it. What can they want, who have Jehovah for their shepherd? What will that Saviour withhold from his friends, who shed his blood for them when enemies, that he might reconcile them to himself? Will not he, who ransomed our souls, provide for our bodies? Alas, our discontent and disconsolation spring from unbelief; and from a negligent or inconsistent conduct, which darkens our prospects and weakens our evidence. Let us then "give diligence to make our calling and election sure;" let us simply trust our Shepherd's care, and listen to his voice: let us cultivate the gentle and amiable dispositions which these emblems suggest: let us keep close to his ordinances as the pasture of our souls; and draw the waters of life "with joy from the wells of salvation," seeking no other consolations: and let us earnestly desire to be kept from wandering, or speedily to be restored from every devious step; for peace and safety can be found only in the paths of righteousness. Thus, walking with God and trusting in him, we may think of death, as our appointed passage to eternal life, without fearing any evil: the outward protection and inward supports of our gracious friend will prevent all harm, and he will receive our souls to the mansion which he hath prepared for them. Whilst he pleases that we should continue here, he can make any situation pleasant, by the unction of his Spirit, and the joys of his salvation, in defiance of all our enemies: and the lively Christian will thankfully acknowledge the Lord's exuberant kindness, and declare his satisfaction in his care and love. Let us then thank him for the past and present, and trust him for the future: let us keep close to his service now; and simply repose our confidence in him, that his goodness will supply our every want, his mercy pardon all our sins, and relieve all our sorrows; that these shall follow us all the days of our life; and that we shall "dwell in the house of the Lord for ever;" in his presence, "where is fulness of joy, and at his right hand, where are pleasures for evermore."

NOTES.

PSALM XXIV. V. 1, 2. This psalm is supposed to have been written and sung, with some others, when David removed the ark to Jerusalem; and perhaps it might also be used when the ark was removed into Solomon's temple. But the ascension of Christ into heaven seems to have been sublimely prefigured under those typical events.—The psalmist introduced his subject by declaring the sovereignty of God over the whole world. He had formed both the earth and its inhabitants, and separated the dry land from the waters; by which it arose out of the floods, and seemed to have its foundation upon them. (Notes. xxxiii. 6, 7. xcv. 4, 5. Gen. i. 9, 10. Job xxxviii. 8-11. Prov. viii. 22-30. Jer. x. 11. 2 Pet. iii. 5-7.) The whole belonged to the great Creator, to be disposed of as he pleased; and he might most justly have cut off all the apostate race; or he might have taken another part of it instead of Israel. (Note. 1 Cor. x. 23-28.) This introduction, therefore, seems to have been intended to excite the people's admiring gratitude for the Lord's distinguishing kindness to them.

V. 3-6. External privileges were granted to Israel: but the character of the true Israelite was here enquired after. (Notes. Ps. xv. P. O.) A holy life, springing from a sanctified heart, free from external and mental idolatry, and all corrupt affections and carnal confidences; united with watchfulness against all hypocrisy and dissimulation; an exact punctuality and fidelity to every vow, profession, or engagement, to God or man, distinguished the acceptable worshippers from the rest of the congregation at the sanctuary, as they do real from nominal Christians. This character originates from regeneration; and is gradually formed by the Divine Spirit, through faith: and while others derive no benefit from divine ordinances, persons of this description receive the blessing from the Lord continually; even "righteousness from the God of salvation." For "by the Spirit they wait for the hope of righteousness through faith." (Marg. Ref.) Thus, it is very clearly stated, that while separation from sin, and a pious conscientious conduct, prepare a man's heart for receiving divine blessings, and evidence his interest in them, they do not constitute his justifying righteousness, or merit the favour of God; in whom he must trust as the "God of his salvation," and from whom he must receive "the gift of righteousness by faith." (Notes. Is. liv. 15-17. Rom. iv. 15-19. x. 1-4. Gal. v. 1-5.) They, who thus trust and serve God, constitute the generation of those who seek him, as Jacob did, and so enjoy his favour. The last clause is thus rendered in an old translation, "This is Jacob," the true seed of Abra-

V. 7—10. It is supposed, that the priests who bare the ark, and the Levites who attended them, demanded entrance into the tabernacle from those who kept the gates. The expression, "Lift up your heads, O ye gates," may allude to the form in which the gates were made, the upper part lifting up, to render the entrance more spacious; the gates might be called "everlasting," because the ark was to have an abiding residence on Mount Zion, where a durable temple was about to be erected. To this demand, the porters within answered in solemn strains, "Who is the King of glory?" and were again answered, that it was, "the LORD strong and mighty, the LORD mighty in battle;" that is, Israel's protector and friend, by whose power they were made victorious over all their enemies. The demand being then repeated, and a similar answer returned, the gates, we may suppose, were thrown open, and the symbol of the Divine presence was carried into the holy of holies. (Notes, lxxvii. 1—3. 2 Sam. vi. 14, 15. 1 Chr. xvi. 7, 35, 36. 2 Chr. v. 11—13.)—This may represent the Saviour at his ascension, demanding by his attendant angels admission into heaven, as man and Mediator; yet, at the same time, as "the King of glory, and the LORD strong and mighty." In human nature, and even on the cross, he had overcome, and triumphed over the powers of darkness; and, ascending up on high, he led them captive at his chariot-wheels. To him the everlasting portals were lifted up, who was at the same time a man, and "the LORD of hosts:" and, as our forerunner, he entered heaven amidst the admiring acclamations of the whole angelic choir. And thus the gates of heavenly happiness were opened to every sinner, who receives Christ as his Lord and Saviour, assured that indeed he is "the LORD of hosts, and the King of glory." (Notes, Eph. i. 15—23. Phil. ii. 9—11. Marg. Ref.)

As the earth, with its fulness, and a its inhabitants, belongs to the great Creator, whose glorious wisdom, power, and goodness appear on every side; we should continually remember our obligations to love and serve him with all our powers; to receive all our comforts as his gifts, and to employ all which we possess, according to his will. This must also remind us of our need of his mercy, and lead us to continual humiliation before him: for which of his gifts have we not abused? which of our powers have we not employed in rebellion? (Note, Luke vii. 40—43.) If we had done all that was commanded us, we ought to have said, “We are unprofitable servants.” How absurd then for sinners to boast of their scanty and defective services! It is of the Lord’s mercy, that any of us worship with acceptance, or may hope to enter into heaven.—We should be thankful for outward privileges; yet let us be careful not to trust in them; but seriously enquire, whether his word and ordinances have indeed been sanctifying to our hearts, and have taught us to walk in newness of life? whether we are weaned from the vanities of the world, and delivered from hypocrisy and deceit, in our professions and engagements? The generation of them who seek and serve the God of Jacob, are formed to a peculiar character; the blessings of salvation and the crown of righteousness must be waited for, in the way of conscientious obedience; and they who expect them in any other way, will find themselves awfully deluded. (Notes, Tit. iii. 11—14. Heb. x. 35—39. Jude 20, 21.)—The incarnate Word, and Son of God, having completed his obedience and sufferings on earth as a surety, hath, in human nature, ascended up on high as a triumphant conqueror. The everlasting portals have been thrown open to receive him. He alone in human nature ascended thither by the merit of his own righteousness: but it is of infinite value and merit for us also, if we believe in him. Whilst angels adore, in the man Christ Jesus, “the King of glory and the Lord of hosts,” and welcome him as head over all things to his church, surely we cannot refuse him our thankful acclamations, or neglect to honour him, as we ought to honour the Father that sent him! (Note, John v. 20—23.) Let all remember that he is able to save and to destroy: “the Lord strong and mighty, the Lord mighty in battle.” If we refuse now to open our hearts to welcome him, he will at length refuse to open the gates of heaven to us; both at the hour of death, and when, after the final judgment, he shall re-enter the heavenly palace, with all the millions of his redeemed people. Then all unbelievers shall go “away into everlasting punishment.”

NOTES.

PSALM XXV. V.1. The repeated and deep confessions of sin, which are blended with the petitions and complaints throughout this psalm, favour the opinion of those, who think it was written during Absalom's rebellion, by which David's atrocious crimes in the matter of Uriah, as well as the sins of his youth, were brought to his remembrance.—The expression "Unto thee do I lift up my soul," emphatically describes the nature of fervent prayer, when all dependence on creatures, and expectation from them, are sensibly renounced; and the earnest desires of the soul accompany the voice, but are indeed too large for utterance. (Marg. Ref. lxii. 8—10. 1 Sam. i. 12—16. Rom. viii. 24—27.)

V. 2, 3. These verses are rendered, in most versions, as a prayer, which they certainly imply; but the future tense being used throughout, and not the imperative, as in the following verses, they may be rendered more literally, "O my God, I trust in thee: I shall not be ashamed; my enemies shall not triumph over me. Yea, none who wait on thee shall be ashamed; they shall be ashamed who act perfidiously without cause."—David had given Saul and his adherents no just cause to hate and persecute him; nor had Absalom, or the rebellious Israelites, any cause for their treason and perfidy. Their hatred was not only unmerited, but directly contrary to his deserts. It was wholly free, or gratuitous. The Jews hated Christ without a cause, or freely; the same word being employed which the apostle uses in respect of a sinner's justification before God, "Being justified freely." (Comp. John xv. 25. Rom. iii. 24. Gr.)

V. 4, 5. 'It is hard to know what to do in these difficult times, especially in this great agitation of my thoughts, wherein my troubled mind is tossed up and down. Therefore, do thou be pleased, O LORD, to shew me the course thou wouldest have me to take, and govern my actions so, that they may be pleasing to thee. I have as much need of thy guidance, as a little child has of its parent's, and I cry as earnestly unto thee, that thou wilt direct me at every step.' (Bp. Patrick.)—To be guided in the path of faithfulness to men, and faith in God, inviolable adherence to truth and duty in such circumstances, was peculiarly desirable. For this blessing, more than for victory, David waited continually, all the day, and every day, on God his Saviour; (so the Septuagint reads it.) (Notes, lxxvii. 3—5. lxxviii. 1, 2.)—The term wait implies a simple, dependent, expecting, attentive state of heart which leads to frequency and constancy in the use of proper means, perseveringly, notwithstanding delays and discouragements, with a resolute rejection of all other confidences, and all inconsistent measures. (Notes, cxxx. 5, 6. Gen. xlix. 18. Lam. iii. 20—30. Jam. v. 7—11.)

V. 6, 7. The contrast between the Lord's "remembering his tender mercies, and lovingkindnesses," which had always been exercised to his worshippers, and sprang from everlasting love; and his not "remembering the psalmist's transgressions, is very expressive. When God thus remembers his mercies, he ceases to remember our sins; that is, he does not punish us for them. (Note, Jer. xxxi. 33, 34.)—The language, also, is peculiarly emphatical. The distinction between the sins of youth, thus brought afresh to remembrance, and later transgressions of which David was conscious, seems to fix the occasion of the psalm to have been as above stated. (Note, 1.) He could find no reason in himself why God should remember him in mercy; but he pleads with him to do it for his own goodness' sake. (Marg. Ref.) Most of the verses in this psalm begin with the Hebrew letters, in alphabetical order, (of which there are several instances in the Psalms; ) but a few omissions and variations are found, which some ascribe to the perturbation of David's mind.

V. 8, 9. The goodness and mercy of God dispose him to be kind even to sinners; and instead of inflicting immediate vengeance, to use various methods of bringing them to repentance. He is "upright" and sincere in all his declarations and invitations, and he loveth truth and justice; he is therefore ever ready to teach his ways of peace and holiness to all those, however sinful, who are humbly willing to learn them, that they may enter and walk in them. But the proud and obstinate, who feel no need of such instructions, or desires after them, and are not disposed to practise what they know, do not properly apply for divine teaching. And as the Master in this school is "meek, and lowly in heart," and teaches with gentleness and wisdom; the scholars should surely be teachable, and learn in meekness and humility. (Notes, Matt. xi. 28-30. Mark x. P. O. 1-16. Notes, Jam. i. 19-21.)

V. 10. All the dealings of God with those who accept of his new-covenant salvation, and "walk with him," by faith in his truths and promises, and in obedience to his commandments, are the result of his wisdom, and consistent with his mercy and faithfulness; and, therefore, they will all eventually do them good, whatever present appearances may be. (Notes, cii. 15-18. Is. lv. 1-3. lvi. 3-7. Rom. viii. 28-32.) Or, all the commands and counsels of God, the paths in which he calls his people to walk with him, are good in themselves, and do good to the upright; and lead them to experience the fulfilment of his merciful and faithful promises.

V. 11. Had David's iniquity been great, and he had thought it but little, his plea would have been inadmissible; but his argument was, that "where sin had abounded, grace might much more abound." (Notes, Rom. v. 20, 21. Eph. i. 3-8.) Thus the name or perfections of God would be displayed and glorified; and, on this ground, he hoped for pardon of his most atrocious sins, and on this alone; so that, if this plea did not prevail, he must sink in hopeless misery.—Some would render the clause "though it be great:" but, certainly, this is not the most obvious construction, and probably would not have been adduced, except either out of dislike to the doctrine implied in our version, or a fear of its being perverted. (Note, Rom. vi. 1, 2.)

V. 12, 13. It is said of all unconverted men, that "There is no fear of God before their eyes;" and that, "the fear of the LORD is the beginning of wisdom." (Notes, xxxvi. 1. cxi. 9, 10. Rom. iii. 9-18.)—Where, then, is that man, in this evil world, who truly reverences the authority of God, who fears his displeasure, and seeks his favour, as the main concern of his life? How disadvantageously soever he may be circumstanced, how great soever his past guilt, or his present darkness and discouragement, the God of all grace, who has excited this fear of him by preventing grace, will assuredly afford him the means of instruction, and enable him to profit by them; so that, eventually, he "shall dwell at ease," or lodge in goodness; and shall find a never-failing source of comfort in the Divine love, whilst he expects the complete felicity of heaven at last.—The inheritance of Canaan was a type of heaven; but, indeed, that man inherits the earth as far as it can profit him, who has food and raiment, and lives contented and in peace; and the godly man may also hope for these blessings in behalf of his children, when about to leave them. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 14. The knowledge of the glory and harmony of the Divine perfections, which encourages a sinner to trust and love a holy God; that sweet communion which the believer enjoys with God his Saviour; and that peace, and those joys, which spring from the earnest of the Spirit, may be well called "The secret of the LORD;" and they lead the soul into a conciliating and satisfactory acquaintance with his purposes, and the wisdom and equity of them; and with the security and blessings of the new covenant, and the assurance of an interest in it. (Notes, Prov. iii. 32. Matt. xiii. 11-13. John xiv. 21-24. Col. iii. 1-4. Rev. ii. 17.) But none, except those who fear God, can possibly enjoy this satisfaction, which must still remain a secret to all ungodly men.—Several other discoveries of the secret plan and purposes of God may also be intended, which none but the pious Christian can receive. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 15, 16. (Notes, cxi. 1, 2. cxlii. 1, 2. cxliv. 4-8. cxli. 9, 10. The word rendered "desolate," is the masculine of the noun, which being feminine, is translated "my darling." (Note, xxii. 19-21.) The Septuagint here render it "only begotten," as it certainly means in some places; but in this connexion it seems rather to imply the destitute condition of the psalmist, when left alone, or forsaken, by his former adherents and friends; and a fit type of Christ, as deserted by his disciples, and surrounded by his insulting enemies.

V. 17-20. Every occurrence during Absalom's rebellion, tended to augment the distress of David; especially as reminding him of his sins, which were thus visited on him, as Nathan had foretold. (Note, 2 Sam. iii. 10, 11.) He therefore united reiterated prayers for pardon, with his earnest requests for deliverance.—He was aware, that even his own son, and his bosom-counsellor, and a vast multitude of the nation, thirsted for his blood, and would decline no violence, treachery, or cruelty, to destroy him; so that his life could be preserved only by the same Divine power and mercy, in which he trusted for the salvation of his soul. (Notes, 2 Sam. xv.—xviii.)—"I shall not be ashamed," &c.

V. 21. In the sight of God, David pleaded guilty of great and many sins; but he had acted an upright part towards his unnatural son, and treacherous subjects. As a penitent, likewise, he was "without guile," and was determined to adopt no sinful measures for his preservation. And thus waiting on God, he trusted that he should be preserved.—"Integrity and uprightness shall preserve me."

V. 22. The cause of the royal sufferer was that of his nation, and of true religion. While he was banished from Jerusalem, the people were oppressed the wicked triumphed, and piety languished: and if the traitors succeeded, the event would exceedingly tend to obstruct the best interests of Israel. David, therefore, in this prayer for the redemption of Israel from oppression, was a type of Christ interceding, amidst his personal sufferings, for his church; and for his own exaltation, as indispensably necessary to her interests, and to the salvation of his elect people. (Notes, li. 18, 19. cxxx. 7, 8. John xvii.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1-7. In vain will our voice be lifted up in prayer, unless our souls be lifted up to God, in fervent desires and believing expectations. They who trust in the Lord, will never be ashamed of their hope; nor shall any boasting or menacing enemies triumph over them. They will wait continually upon the Lord with their humble desires, and wait his time of granting them: and whilst others have the benefit of their prayers; thousands are praying for them, by character, if not by name; their heavenly Advocate also presents his effectual intercessions: and a cause so pleaded cannot but prevail; as they who injure or hate them, without cause or provocation, will at length experience to their unspeakable shame and confusion. But we must be careful not to give our enemies so much as a plausible pretext for their malice: and for that reason should above all things be instant in praying, to be guided in the ways of truth and holiness. The most wise and experienced feel most their need of this continual teaching, and are most desirous of it: not only lest they should be wholly deceived, but lest they should be seduced into any paths of error or iniquity. They will therefore "wait all the day" on "the God of their salvation." And his tender mercies, and his love to his people of old, will encourage them to come to him, that they may be remembered in the same gracious manner.—Recent transgressions followed by chastisements, if they have a proper effect, must lead most of us to recollect, and with shame confess, the sins of our youth, which are thus remembered against us; and thus we may humbly hope that the Lord will remember us according to his mercy, and blot them out for his goodness' sake.

V. 8-22. The most ignorant or atrocious sinner may properly be encouraged to trust in our gracious God, who in perfect sincerity invites all who hear to come to him. He delights in directing the sinner in the way of acceptance, and the believer in the paths of holiness: and when the heart is humbled, and the rebellious will subdued, the understanding shall be further enlightened to perceive the truths of God. He, who has learned, in meek and humble teachableness, to sit at the Saviour's feet and hear his word, shall soon be made acquainted with the secret comforts of true godliness, and shewn the nature and excellency of his everlasting covenant: and, having acceded to it, and learned to walk with him in faith and obedience, according to its tenour; he shall find every one of the Lord's dispensations towards him to be unmingled truth and mercy, not excepting his sharpest trials and severest corrections. The sudden recollection of the greatness of his iniquity may often assail his confidence; but faith in the Lord's more abundant mercy can even convert that into an argument, why he should pardon. Pride, obstinacy, and the love of sin, dictate all the complaints which are made of difficulty and uncertainty, in discovering the truth and will of God: for wherever there is a man who truly fears the Lord, he shall certainly be taught by the Holy Spirit the safe and happy way. He will surely be directed to the Saviour, and there find rest to his soul; and, reposing his care and confidence upon his reconciled God, he will cheerfully wait for more complete joys in heaven; and commit his children to the Lord, desiring his blessing for their inheritance. That we come short of this serene and happy life, is the effect of remaining unbelief and disobedience; and because we are so often heedlessly running into the snare

PSALM XXVI.

David professes his integrity; and his delight in the people and ordinances of God, with a solemn appeal to him, 1-8. He deprecates the doom of the wicked, and unites earnest prayers with pious purposes and believing confidence in God, 9-12.

attending on the ordinances of God, and meeting with his people. With serious preparation of heart, and in the exercise of repentance, faith, and a good conscience, he approaches the table of the Lord, to enjoy fellowship with him and his disciples; and to publish with the voice of thanksgiving, and to tell of all the wonders of redeeming love. Having loved the courts of the Lord, and every place and company, where his praises were displayed, and his glorious truths discoursed on; he would dread above all things the doom at last of wicked men. A few hours with the covetous, malicious, and deceitful are very painful: eternity in such company would form a hell to him. This antipathy gives just confidence that his soul shall never be gathered with them, and animates him still to walk in his integrity, and to cry for mercy and complete redemption. Thus he feels his ground firm under him: and, as he delights in blessing God with his congregations on earth; he trusts that shortly he shall join the great assembly in heaven, in "singing praises to God and to the Lamb for evermore."

NOTES.

PSALM XXVII. V. 1—3. It is probable that this psalm was composed by David in the extremity of his danger from Saul, in order to silence the fears of his companions, by shewing them the strength and reasonableness of his confidence; (Note, xi. 1—3;) though some think it relates to his subsequent conflicts and dangers. However that were, JEHOVAH himself was David's LIGHT, his Teacher, Guide, Comforter; "and his SALVATION," both from temporal dangers and eternal misery: he was "the Strength of his life," his powerful Protector and Upholder; and therefore he had no reason to fear any enemies. (Note, 2 Sam. xxii. 2, 3.) When, in former instances, his wicked persecutors had come against him in force and rage, as if they meant to devour him, (Note Job xxxi. 29, 32;) they stumbled and fell: and he was assured they would do so again: and, being confident that God was on his side, was determined that he would not yield to fear, even if a whole army should march in battle-array, to wage the most desperate war against him. (iii. 6. Compare this with the complaint of Saul. 1 Sam. xxviii. 15.)—When the malignant enemies of Christ came to seize him in his deepest humiliation, at one word of his, they went backward and fell to the ground. (Note, John xviii. 4—9.)

V. 4—6. David was conscious, that the service of God was his choice, and, as it were, his element. (Note, xxvi. 6—9.) Though a brave soldier, a renowned commander and conqueror, and an anointed king, yet his one desire above all others, and his constant prayer and persevering endeavour was, to dwell in, or at, the tabernacle of the Lord, where his ordinances were administered; which were typical of the promised Messiah and his salvation, means of grace to believers, and acts of worship to God. (Note, lxiii. 1—4.) If he might choose for himself, he would spend all the days of his life in the courts of the Lord; that he might meditate with joy upon the beauty and glory of the Divine perfections there displayed, (Notes, l. 1, 2. lxiii. 1—4,) and have constant opportunity of enquiring the will of God, by the high priest, and from his word; and that he might take shelter, as in the pavilion of his heavenly King, where no enemy could find him, or would dare to approach him. Thus he hoped to be fixed as on a rock, immovable by changes or assaults. Indeed, though now driven from the courts of God, he was assured that he should at length be exalted above all his enemies; and be brought back again to the sanctuary; when he would offer sacrifices of joy and thanksgiving, with animated and triumphant songs of praise and gratitude. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 8. This verse may be literally rendered, "My heart said unto thee, Seek ye my face, Thy face, LORD, will I seek." In retired meditation, the exhortations of God to the sons of men to seek his face or favour, were recollected by the psalmist: and his heart answered, "Dost thou deign thus to invite us? Then without delay, or hesitation, I will seek thy face."

V. 9. "Do not in anger reject my suit, because I am a sinner: but accept it, because I am thy servant, whom in former times thou hast so often relieved, that I am emboldened to beseech thee not to desert me,—but to give me deliverance and safety." (Bp. Patrick.)—David expected eternal salvation from the tried mercy and truth of the God of his salvation; and this gave him confidence as to temporal deliverances. (Note, Ps. cxix. 121, 122.)

V. 10. Perhaps David's parents died about this time, or he was deprived of the solace of their company. Perhaps he meant in general, that the favour of God would compensate the loss of all earthly friends; and the nearest and most endeared relations; that the Lord would surely prove faithful, though they should prove cruel and treacherous; and that he was determined to stay his mind on God alone.

V. 11, 12. The psalmist knew himself to be constantly beset with spies and false-witnesses, who pried into all his actions, in order to find some handle against him; that they might gratify their cruel malice, under the pretence of justice; and this led him to pray frequently for heavenly wisdom, and that God would lead him in the path of uprightness, and at a distance from the appearance of evil; that so his observers might be disappointed.—Thus the Son of David, also, was continually watched, that some accusation might be found against him: but his perfect holiness and wisdom completely frustrated and confounded his implacable foes, who thirsted for his blood. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 13. This verse may be rendered "Assuredly, I trust to see the goodness of the LORD," &c. Perhaps some person had asked David, how he kept up his spirits under his manifold trials and dangers? and he gave him this answer, as comprising the whole secret of his cheerful confidence.—"The land of the living," in this connexion, seems to imply a prospect beyond this present dying world. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 14. Some understand this verse, as the psalmist's apostrophe to his own soul; but perhaps it was chiefly intended as an exhortation to his discouraged companions in tribulation; and also as a pious counsel to every one who might at any future time read this admirable psalm. (Notes, xxv. 4, 5. lxii. 1, 2, 5—10. Hos. xii. 3—6. Mic. vii. 5—7. Hab. ii. 1—3.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

He, who is "the light of the world," is the eternal JEHOVAH: and whosoever "followeth him, shall not abide in darkness, but shall have the light of life." (Notes, John viii. 12. ix. 4—7. xii. 44—50.) He will guide every believer into the knowledge of his truth, and the comforts of his salvation; and into an acquaintance with the dangers, snares, and enemies, which beset his path, and the manner in which they are to be avoided and overcome. He will uphold and protect their souls, and their lives also, as long as that is good for them; and he will keep them, by his power, through faith, unto complete salvation. Happy are they, whose faith and hope are as vigorous as the security is valid. They need not fear armies of hostile assailants, or legions of infernal spirits, united for their destruction, with rage equal to their force. "In this they may be confident;" for "the eternal God is their refuge." (Notes, Deut. xxxiii. 27—29.)—The temporary success of the wicked is only an introduction to their deeper disgrace and misery; they shall soon stumble, and fall, and rise no more; but the trials of believers will terminate in everlasting honour and felicity. Let us then entreat the Lord to "give us faith," and to "increase our faith;" that we may be delivered from tormenting fears, and honour our protector by cheerful composure, when the hearts of others are shaken, as the trees of the wood are moved by the tempestuous wind.—But the believer's confidence is distinguishable from the hypocrite's presumption. Whatever be the Christian's rank, expectations, reputation, or employment; he considers the favour and service of God, as his "one thing needful." (Note, Luke x. 38—42.) This he prays for, and seeks after: (for what is heartily desired will be diligently sought.) He devises, if he can, to dwell near the ordinances of God, that he may have constant access to them; for they are the rest of his soul, to which he returns with pleasure, when he hath necessarily been called from them. He delights in contemplating the beauty and glory of the Lord, in the person of Jesus Christ; and he enquires his will, by studying his word, and praying for his teaching Spirit: and he hides himself from cares, and fears, and foes, in the presence-chamber of his King and Father, where no pursuer can discover him, or will venture to assault him: and whilst he drinks the waters, which flow from the rock of ages, he fixes his hope and soul upon the rock itself, for stability and support. With such desires and experiences, we may triumph amidst conflicts, and "rejoice in tribulation." The Saviour, who suffered and conquered for us, will conquer by us; and, in hope of rendering eternal songs of praise in the temple above, we may now celebrate every mercy, with sacrifices of exulting joy and thanksgiving here on earth. But we should all be far more joyful and thankful, if we were more instant and fervent in prayer.—To the blessings of salvation, the word of God invites sinners at large; yet, instead of attending to this call to seek his face, men turn their backs on him and his ways; for the heart of him alone, who is "born of God," echoes to the invitation; he fears nothing so much as the hiding of his face, and being excluded from his service, or left to come short of his salvation: every token of his displeasure grieves him; and this renders him watchful and jealous of his own heart, and animates his supplications.—The loss of earthly friends, or their unkindness, or anxiety about them, leads him more diligently to seek, or more highly to value, a relation to his heavenly Friend: and should his attachment to the Lord forfeit the favour of all his relatives, that loss would prove his richest gain. Let then the destitute, the orphan, and the widow, seek to the LORD, who is "a Father of the fatherless," and he will take them up; let us all seek to be taught and led in his ways, and in a plain path, that we may neither wander, nor stumble, nor cause our enemies to rejoice: and if we meet with the envenomed tongue of slander, or with cruel persecutions, let us remember "the man after God's own heart;" or rather let us look unto the suffering Saviour, and pray in faith not to be delivered up into the hands of our enemies. Having found the supports and comforts of the Lord's favour in times past; let us not faint, but "verily hope to see his goodness in the land of the living." Let us encourage others to "wait for the LORD," and not to yield to fear in the midst of dangers and enemies; for his grace will be sufficient for their support and deliverance. And, whatever we may meet with in this dying world, he

NOTES.

PSALM XXVIII. V. 1. It is not agreed, whether this psalm was written during David's persecutions from Saul; or at a later period of his life.—"Be not silent," &c. Treat not my humble requests with silent neglect.—"The words rendered "the pit," generally mean the grave, when used in this manner; yet, when the death of the wicked is thus expressed, it seems also to denote the place of future punishment; for all men go down into the grave, but the wicked into "the pit of destruction," (lv. 23).—If God did not shew, by some visible interposition, that he heard and answered David's prayers, he must soon be cut off and laid in the grave, never more to glorify God on earth; and it would appear as if he died under the Divine wrath, as the wicked do. (Marg. Ref.)—Had Christ continued in the grave, it might have been concluded, that he had been justly put to death: but he was justified and proved to be the Son of God by his resurrection. (Notes, Rom. i. 1-4. iv. 23-25. 1 Cor. xv. 12-28.)

V. 2. Holy oracle. The place of the ark of the covenant, and the mercy-seat. (Notes, 1 Kings vi. 15-22. viii. 6. 28-30. Dan. vi. 10, 11.)

V. 3. "Draw me not away," as criminals are violently carried to the place of execution.—David deprecated the doom which awaited his deceitful persecutors, or that of Saul in particular. (Notes, xxvi. 9-11. xxxvi. 3, 4. lli. 1-5. Prov. xxvi. 23-27.)

V. 4, 5. The language in the first of these verses is that of prayer, in the latter of prediction. In the one the psalmist calls on God to deliver him, and plead the cause of true religion, by executing deserved punishment on his implacable enemies: in the other he assigns the reason why he used this language; namely, because he foresaw this doom coming on them, and because their conduct shewed them to be given up to final hardness of heart.—In general, we may and ought to pray, for the just punishment of all impenitent enemies of the church; but with particular application to individuals, such prayers can only be proper for inspired persons.—To be dealt with according to their deservings, must be most tremendous to every sinner. (Note, Jam. ii. 8-13.)—Regard not, &c. (5.) (Notes, xcii. 4-7. Is. v. 11-17. xxii. 8-14. xxvi. 9-11. Rom. i. 18-20. 28-32.)

V. 6, 7. This sudden transition, from earnest prayer, to exulting joy and praise, accords so much with the method of those psalms, which are evidently prophetic of Christ, that some expositors interpret this of him; and suppose these verses to be spoken as an anticipation of the triumphs and glory which followed his deep humiliation and sufferings. (Notes, xxii. 22-31.)—David himself, however, seems frequently to have anticipated the answer of his prayers in a similar manner; or, perhaps, after his deliverances, while leading the praises of his people, he contrasted the joyful scene, with the dangers and sorrows, the prayers and tears, which preceded it.

V. 8. Some versions render this, "The LORD is their strength: (that is, that of his people:) and his Messiah is the strength of salvations."—The original may bear this construction; and, no doubt, David had reference to Christ, whom he typified both in his conflicts and victories; and the blessings of God conferred on his people through him.

V. 9. David's prayer for Israel was in some respects typical of Christ's intercession for his church.—The authority of a good prince resembles the care of a tender shepherd over his flock. The word rendered feed, therefore, means also rule; and is applied to JEHOVAH, to the Messiah, and to David, and others. (Notes, 2 Sam. v. 1, 2. Is. xl. 9-11. Jer. xxiii. 3, 4. Mic. v. 3, 4. vii. 14-17. Marg. Ref.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

Whilst others are troubling their fellow-creatures with unavailing complaints; believers should, under distresses, cry the more earnestly to "the Rock of their salvation;" and they should not rest, till they have received some satisfactory token that their prayers are heard; for if the Lord could refuse to answer them, their case would resemble that of those who have perished in their sins, to whose agonizing cries no gracious answer will be made for ever. But this can never befall those who come to the mercy-seat of a reconciled God, in "the holy place not made with hands:" through the intercession of our great High Priest, sincerely desiring and humbly hoping for those blessings, which he purchased by his meritorious sacrifice, and is now exalted to bestow. They will not, however, merely deprecate the punishment which awaits the wicked, and the effects of their persecuting malice; but they will likewise earnestly pray that they may not be drawn away by their enticements, to adopt their errors, and imitate their sins: for the ungodly are more to be dreaded, when they "speak peace to their neighbours," than when they avow the mischief which is in their hearts. We may, without hesitation, predict that impenitent sinners will ere long be recompensed according to their endeavours to do evil: and we cannot desire that the obstinate enemies of Christ should escape condign punishment. Indeed, if men duly regarded the works of the Lord, the displays of his power and majesty would intimidate them from rebellion; and "his goodness would lead them to repentance;" but alienation of heart from God causes men to neglect all his operations, and to despise even his redeeming love. And he will surely destroy such as do so; and not build them up, though for a time they prosper.—The servant of God is often encouraged to anticipate the answers of his prayers, whilst he is yet asking. When praising him for his goodness, and "rejoicing with joy unspeakable and full of glory;" it is very profitable to recollect and record our earnest cries in the time of our distress; and, whilst our hearts rejoice in the Lord, our strength and shield, we should not forget our "brethren in tribulation," but pray fervently for them also.—In the exaltation of our anointed King, who was once crucified for us, we have the earnest, and exemplar, of all our deliverances. In his name we may present our supplications, in full assurance of hope, that our God will "save his people, and bless his inheritance;" that he will protect, provide for, and comfort them on earth, and at length lift them up for ever in heaven. But what are all those sudden transitions from deep distress to joyful praises, which take place in the believer's experience here; compared with that, which every one of them successively finds, when in a moment, he exchanges the groans and agonies of death, for heavenly joys and uninterrupted hallelujahs!

NOTES.

PSALM XXIX. V. 1, 2. The psalmist here calls on the mightiest princes of the earth who demand homage, and sometimes worship, from men, to render glory to the universal Sovereign and Judge; and to come and pay their tribute of adoration at his sanctuary, in which he displayed the beauty and excellency of his holy character and perfections. (Notes, ii. 10-12. cxvi. 6-9. cxxxviii. 4, 5. cxlv. 3-7. cxlviii. 11-13.)—Ascribe to, &c. (Common Prayer-book version.)—Beauty of, &c. (Marg.) (Note, 2 Chr. xx. 20, 21.)

V. 3-11. It is probable that this psalm was composed during a violent storm of thunder and lightning, which reminded David, and led him earnestly to remind others, how mean and feeble the most mighty and honourable of the earth were, in comparison of the God of "glory and strength." (Notes, Job xxxvi. 22-33. xxxvii. 1-13. P. O. 1-13. xl. 9-14.)—"You," (ye princes of the earth,) "think there is great power in your words; but, as they can be heard but a little way, so they are but of little force, in comparison with this mighty voice; wherein the Lord expresses how potent he is, and strikes a dread and horror into all that hear it." (Bp. Patrick.)—The thunder is often called the voice of God; (Ex. ix. 28. Marg. Notes, 2 Sam. xxii. 7-16. Rev. iv. 4, 5. Marg. Ref.) During a violent storm, he seems in glorious majesty to ride upon the many waters which form the clouds, and he shakes the ocean as well as the earth. The power of the lightning equals the terror of the thunder; enormous cedars are shivered and scattered by it in a moment; the very mountains shake, and seem to move with agility, like a calf, or a young rhinoceros, by the tempest, or the earthquakes, with which they are sometimes accompanied. The flames of the electrical fire, at the direction of the Almighty, are divided with inconceivable swiftness, and irresistible force; and even the wilderness is thrown into a trepidation. The hinds, affrighted, cast forth their young; and the forests are stripped, and their dark recesses laid open; the trees being shivered, their branches torn off, and the wild beasts affrighted in their dens.—The clause rendered, "the hinds to calve," is, by some, read, with a small alteration of the text, "the oaks to tremble."—But the people who worshipped God at his sanctuary, heard his voice from his word, which, though replete with encouragement, was more majestic and powerful than the thunder and lightning; and, being secure under his protection, they spake of his glory, as displayed in all these terrific events. For HE, who once directed the rising,

A Psalm of David.

David calls on the mighty to give glory to God, 1, 2. He shews the majesty and power of his voice, 3-9: and that, as the eternal King, he will strengthen and bless his people, 10, 11.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The mighty and honourable of the earth derive all their power and splendour from the eternal JEHOVAH; but, alas! few of them attempt to render to him the honour of his name, or "to worship him in the beauty of holiness!" They should, however, be reminded, that this is their highest privilege, interest, and happiness. The most exalted creatures, indeed, cannot render to the infinite God, their Creator and constant benefactor, all "the glory which is due to him," much less can any sinner; but when we come before him, as "in Christ reconciling the world unto himself," adoring his majesty, submitting to his authority and righteousness, in genuine repentance and faith, and offering our spiritual sacrifices of praise and thanksgiving, and willing obedience; he will pardon and accept our defective services, though infinitely beneath his majesty and excellency.—The majestic terror and destructive effects of thunders, lightnings, hurricanes, and earthquakes, with the consternation which they occasion, while they impress on us a sense of God's omnipotence, and of man's impotency, should lead us to think of the defenceless and desperate condition to which the wicked will be reduced in the day of judgment.—For the voice of the Divine law, if duly attended to, would fill the consciences of sinners with more terror and amazement than all the convulsions of nature; (Notes, Ex. xix. 16-20. x. 18-25. Deut. v. 22-25. Heb. xii. 18-21); and the effects of the word of God, when attended by the operations of his Holy Spirit, are far greater upon the souls of men, than that of thunder in the material world. By its energy the stoutest are made to tremble, the proudest are abased, the secrets of the heart are detected, sinners are converted; and the savage, the sensual, and the unclean, become harmless, gentle, and pure, resembling doves and lambs. If we have heard his voice, and fled for refuge to lay hold of the hope set before us; if we have welcomed Christ as a Saviour, and submitted to him as our King for ever; if, relying on his merits, we are no longer terrified by "the ministration of death," yet have learned to love him, and keep his commandments; let us remember, that it is the same glorious God our Saviour who causeth the thunder; and the children need not fear their Father's voice, when he speaks in anger to his enemies. Whilst they tremble who are exposed, without shelter, to his vengeance, let us in his temple, his appointed refuge, (safe as Noah in the ark,) thank him for our security, and speak of his honour. "Let us give diligence to the full assurance of hope unto the end;" and continually plead his promises, expecting that he will give us strength to resist temptation, to bear trials, to conquer enemies, and to perform every duty; and that he will bless us with a quiet conscience, a contented mind, and the "peace of God, which passeth all understanding;" that he will give us sweet composure, even in the solemn hour of death, and exulting boldness amidst the dissolution of this visible creation, and in the "day of judgment and perdition of ungodly men;" knowing that our Saviour and King will rule even that flood of vengeance, and those tremendous convulsions; and that he hath prepared for us "new heavens and a new earth, wherein dwelleth righteousness." NOTES.

PSALM XXX. Title. This title may be rendered "A psalm: a song at the dedication of the house for David." When advanced to the throne, and possessed of mount Zion, the psalmist built himself a house, which no doubt he dedicated to God, by fervent prayer, and joyful thanksgivings; and, perhaps, by making a religious feast for his friends. (Note, Deut. xx. 5-9.) But there is nothing in this psalm peculiarly appropriate to that occasion; and it was evidently composed either after a dangerous illness, or when he had experienced some extraordinary deliverance.—Many think that it was used after Absalom's rebellion, when David returned to Jerusalem; and, having purified his house from the defilement which had polluted it, he solemnly dedicated both it and himself to God. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 1, 2. (Notes, xxxv. 17-19. 25-28. xli. 11-13.) Healed. (2.) If this word be literally understood, a dangerous illness, and an unexpected recovery, gave occasion to the psalm. But some think the expression to be used figuratively, (as no doubt it frequently is;) and to denote a forlorn and hopeless condition, like that of a sick man given over by physicians, and unable to help himself. The expectation of his death, formed by David's enemies, and the joy and triumph which that event would have given them, peculiarly suit the state of things during Absalom's rebellion. (Note, xli. 4-8.)

V. 3. (Notes, xvi. 8-11. xxviii. 1. lxxvii. 13. cxvi. 8-12. cxviii. 17, 18. Is. xxxviii. 17-20.)

V. 4. This word (saints) signifieth them that have received mercy, and shew mercy liberally to others. Several words, varying in meaning, but all implying genuine piety and holiness, are translated, "saints," in different parts of Scripture. By persons of this character, the holiness of God, (or his moral excellencies, as displayed in his word, and by his works,) is reflected on with admiring and grateful love, and celebrated with joyful praises. (Notes, Ex. xv. 11. Is. vi. 1-4. xxx. 8-11. Rev. iv. 6-8.)

V. 5. The concise manner in the original of this verse, is very expressive. "For a moment in his anger; life in his favour; weeping may lodge in the evening; but singing in the morning." No doubt this is meant exclusively of weeping penitents, or submissive suffering believers, and not of the ungodly or hypocritical. (Notes, cxli. 9. cxv. 5, 6. Matt. v. 4.)—See his clemency to his faithful servants, whom he may correct sharply for a little while; but is soon reconciled, and then extends his favour to them without any end, and sends deliverance to them so suddenly, and unexpectedly, as well as seasonably; that where nothing but lamentations were heard over-night, there nothing but shouts of joy are heard in the morning. (Bp. Patrick.)

V. 6-8. When the psalmist had been delivered from Saul's persecuting malice, and was settled peaceably in his kingdom, and rendered victorious over the enemies of Israel, he seems to have concluded that his trials and dangers were over, and that he should thenceforth have uninterrupted peace. (Notes, 2 Sam. vii. 1-3. 18. 19. 25-29.) But while he ascribed his great prosperity, and the firm establishment of his authority, to the faithfulness, power, and love of God, he seems to have given way to unwarranted confidence, and to have remitted his vigilance and activity, and, probably, the fervency of his devotion. (Note, xi. 1-5.) Thus he was gradually drawn into a course of inexpedient indulgence; and, at length, into most aggravated guilt, in the matter of Uriah, which threatened the final ruin of his comfort, reputation, authority, and family;

9 'What profit is there in my blood, when I go down to the pit? Shall the dust praise thee? shall it declare thy truth?

10 "Hear, O LORD, and have mercy upon me: LORD, <sup>b</sup>be thou my helper.

11 Thou <sup>a</sup>hast turned for me my mourning into <sup>a</sup>dancing: thou hast put off my sackcloth, and <sup>a</sup>girded me with gladness;

12 To the end that <sup>a</sup>my glory may sing praise to thee, <sup>b</sup>and not be silent. O LORD my God, <sup>a</sup>I will give thanks unto thee for ever.

PSALM XXXI.

David avows his confidence in God, craves his help, and rejoices in his mercy, 1-8. He states his various trials, and blends his complaints with prayers, 9-18. He admires the goodness of God to those who fear him, and excites the saints to love and trust him, 19-24.

To the chief Musician, A Psalm of David.

and actually exposed him to sharp rebukes, anguish of spirit, and overwhelming domestic afflictions, till Absalom's rebellion formed a sort of crisis in his case, and reduced him to such an humble, submissive, believing, and devout, state of mind, as prepared him for returning peace and comfort. (Notes, 2 Sam. xi. -xx.) The Lord "hid his face, and he was troubled;" (Notes, x. i. xiii. 1-4.) His deepest trouble, however, was but for a moment; his weeping, when both sins and sufferings combined to render him inconsolable, continued for a night, and joy came in the morning. God, in answer to his prayers, "restored to him the joy of his salvation;" (Note, li. 12, 13;) and he spent the rest of his days in a degree of prosperity, honour, and comfort, which, in so dreadful a case as his had been, was beyond what could at all have been expected.

V. 9, 10. If God had permitted his offending servant to be slain, or to die of disease, he could no more have served the cause of religion, or glorified him in his church on earth: but, if spared, he purposed to celebrate the mercy and truth of God among his people, and hoped thus to do essential service to Israel. (Notes, lxxii. 17, 18. lxxxviii. 10-12. Is. xxxviii. 17-20.) The concluding part of the first book of Chronicles, shews that his purposes and expectations were fully established.

V. 11, 12. These verses illustrate the doctrine of the fifth verse, by the psalmist's own experience, whose case seemed as likely to form an exception to the general rule, as any that could well be conceived. The figurative language, used on the occasion, is highly descriptive of the most exulting gladness, and most animated, constant, and unmingled praises; such as are found in the six concluding psalms. (Marg. Ref. Notes, cxlv. 1, 2. cxlvi. 2.)—The tongue, when thus employed, is the distinguishing honour of our animal frame; and seems to be meant by "my glory." (Comp. xvi. 9. Acts ii. 26.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

We ought to dedicate all our possessions and enjoyments to Him who gave them to us: our habitations should be daily entrusted to his care, and consecrated to his service, by the word of God and prayer; and by excluding from them, as far as we can, whatever is displeasing in his sight. And when our comforts have been interrupted, and are again restored; we should renew our dedication of them to the service of our God. But, alas! how many houses, even of men called Christians, are not only destitute of religion, but also scenes of such impiety and wickedness, that one might almost be led to conclude, they had been set apart to the service of the devil!—In this militant state it calls for our admiring gratitude, when the Lord lifts us up out of one difficulty after another, and does not suffer our foes to rejoice over us. Returning health, or deliverance from imminent dangers, is peculiarly pleasant, when given in answer to fervent prayers. But the redemption of our souls from "the pit of destruction" calls for our greatest thankfulness: and he, who heard the Saviour, and raised him from the dead, will thus save and bless all his true disciples. Let us then praise God for that earnest of all our mercies and hopes, and call upon all the saints to join us in our hallelujahs. These may "rejoice at the remembrance of his holiness:" for as the Lord hateth sin, and hath taught them to hate it, his purity assures them, that he will wholly sanctify them; and all his perfections afford security for their eternal salvation. His anger, which is everlasting against the impenitent, "endureth but for a moment." He will frown, rebuke, and correct when they offend: then they will mourn and repent; this may continue for a night, but joy will speedily return; and the renewed sense of his favour, which is their life and comfort, like the rising sun, will make it morning with their souls.—But let all beware of unwarranted confidence and carnal security: neither outward prosperity nor inward peace are here immovable: the Lord in his favour hath fixed the believer's safety, firm as the deep-rooted mountains; but in every thing else he may expect to be shaken, and to meet with temptations and afflictions. When we grow unwatchful, we fall into sin; and the Lord hides his face, our comforts droop, troubles assail, and perhaps our enemies insult over us. And to arise from such depths requires redoubled earnestness and diligence; renewed humble confessions and fervent importunate prayers. We should intreat the Lord, that we may not close our lives under his frown, in <sup>a</sup> way dishonourable to his name, or unprofitable to our brethren; and we may properly pray to have our lives spared, that we may yet praise him on earth, and declare his truth. In this way our comforts will be again restored; the penitent's sackcloth will in due time be changed for the robe of salvation, and the garments of praise: (Note, Is. lxi. 10, 11;) and our tongues will be our glory, being employed to the glory of our God. But indeed the continuance of life, and even that of our bodies in the grave, will be but as a moment, compared with eternity; and, whatever may befall us by the way, or however we come to the end of our course; if we have learned to love and praise God on earth, we shall exult in his favour, and give him thanks for ever and ever.

NOTES

PSALM XXXI. V. 1. It may be supposed that David wrote this psalm, to encourage himself and his friends, during his extreme danger of being seized on by Saul, when he fled from Keilah: (Notes, 1 Sam. xxiii. 22-28;) or that he recollected his prayers, and meditations, and confidence after his extraordinary deliverance, and thus recorded them, for the honour of God and the encouragement of his people: and we should realize these circumstances, which precluded all hope of escape by ordinary means, if we would enter into the spirit of the psalmist, and perceive the strength of his faith and confidence in God. But David, in his greatest dangers and trials, expecting deliverance from God, was only a feeble type of the Saviour, in his extreme sufferings, his deep humiliation, and his prospect of the joy set before him.—The clause, rendered "Let men ever be ashamed," is literally, "I shall not be ashamed for ever." (Note, Is. xlv. 15-17.)

V. 2-4. David and his men had taken shelter in some natural stronghold formed by a rock: but he was fully aware, that this hiding-place or house of defence, now it was surrounded by Saul's army, must rather prevent than aid his escape. As, however, he had been used to make "the name of the Lord his strong tower;" and as he considered the honour of the Divine power, righteousness, and truth engaged on his side; he felt a confidence that he should be rescued by some extraordinary interposition of God. (Notes, Ps. xci. 1, 2. 8, 9. cxlv. 1, 2. Deut. xxxii. 3, 4. 30, 31. 2 Sam. xxii. 2, 3.) Yet the case was urgent; and therefore he earnestly prayed to be answered speedily: and to be led, and guided out of the intricacy, in which he was enclosed by his persecutors. For they had, as it were, caught him in a net by stratagem; and he had neither sagacity nor power sufficient to rescue himself out of their hands. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 5. Our blessed Saviour adopted the first clause of this verse, when expiring on the cross; and many things in the psalm may be applied to him: and David evidently perceived himself to be in such constant danger, that he could have no security either to his life or soul, but by thus, day by day, entrusting them to the powerful and faithful hands of God.—Christ omitted the latter clause of the verse, which more properly relates to the type, than to the antitype. (Matt. xxvii. 46. Note, Acts vii. 54-60.)—All the deliverances of the church, and of believers, of old, were earnest of the redemption made by the death of Christ, and wrought with reference to it: and the merciful deliverances, which the psalmist had received, encouraged him still to confide in "the Lord God of truth."

V. 6. "Lying vanities," or, the vainest, or emptiest of vanities; may denote the idols in which the gentiles confided, and to which Israel was extremely prone: (Notes, Jer. x. 1-5. 12-15;) but the expression seems likewise to mean, all attempts to obtain information or assistance from those who had familiar spirits, or in any way practised sorcery and witchcraft, which in fact was one of the worst sorts of idolatry. Perhaps David observed a disposition among his adherents, in times of extreme danger, to have recourse to expedients of this kind: but he thus expressed his abhorrence of the practice, and his determination to stand aloof from all who were guilty of it, and to admit no trust but in God alone.—Saul hastened and aggravated his own awful doom, by regarding these "lying vanities." (Note, 1 Chr. x. 13, 14.)

V. 7, 8. "I will be glad and rejoice in thy mercy;" (speaking of the future:) to conceive of the psalmist in the crisis of his danger, thus anticipating his deliverance, and his joy in the mercy of God in it, gives the passage a peculiar animation. His gracious God had often before this regarded him under his deepest depressions: and so noticed, or owned, him in trouble and danger, as to permit no enemy to take away his life. He had repeatedly been in the power of the enemy, as to all human probability: yet God had not shut him up in it, but had constantly delivered him from straits, placing him, as in an open and large place, where he could not be surrounded or entangled: (Note, 2 Sam. xxii. 21.) and he trusted he would still do the same. (Marg. Ref.)—Or this may be the language, which David anticipated that he should soon use, concerning his present alarming situation, when confined in a cave, and surrounded by his fierce persecutors.—Thus Christ seemed to be left in the power of his enemies: but, in the extremity of his sufferings, he anticipated his resurrection, and "the joy set before him."

V. 9. The psalmist's present feelings seem to have interrupted the full exercise of his faith and hope. Such a succession of dangers, hardships, and provocations, tended to depress his spirits, make his eyes languid, injure his health, and prey upon his vitals.—Some suppose, that entire want of provisions was added to the rest of his difficulties: so that he and his men were ready to die with hunger.

V. 10-13. The life of David, while persecuted by Saul, was one continued series of afflictions and sorrows, except as he rose above them by faith and communion with God. It must be supposed that he felt his sufferings with great sensibility: and while dejected and weakened under them, in body and mind, his former sins were brought to remembrance, and he considered himself as visited for them.—Not only did his enemies reproach him, but his neighbours, his friends, and his relations, eagerly joined the senseless clamour! Every one was afraid of seeing him, and shunned him, in the streets or roads, for fear of being involved in his ruin. (Notes, lxxxviii. 5-9. 1 Sam. xxi. 1-6. Job vi. 15-23. xix. 5-22. xxx. 1-14.) His case was thought hopeless: and he was no more regarded than a dead corpse, or a broken earthen vessel, which never can be repaired. (Notes, cxix. 81-83.) Numbers, and those principal men, sought favour by slandering him; all from fear declined speaking in his behalf: while his powerful enemies plotted together concerning the best method of killing him.—The marginal references will shew how each of these circumstances was, still more emphatically, observable in the history of the divine Saviour, when he became "a man of sorrows," and "despised and rejected of men." One circumstance indeed must be excepted: "he was wounded for our transgressions," but had no iniquity of his own.—This passage seems to mark out the crisis before mentioned as the date of the psalm: but as events not wholly dissimilar occurred during Absalom's rebellion, after David had brought great guilt on his conscience, in the matter of Uriah; some expositors apply the several expressions to Shimei's reproaches, Ahithophel's counsel, and the other particulars of that eventful period. (Notes, 2 Sam. xv-xvii.)

V. 14. "I have said, Thou art my God;" that is, "I have determined to seek all my salvation, my present security and comfort, and my eternal happiness, entirely from thy omnipotency and all-sufficiency, and in thy mercy, truth, and unchangeable love, as revealed in thy word." (Notes, xvi. 2, 3. xxii. 1. lxxii. 1-4.)

V. 15. The psalmist well knew, that the time of his troubles and deliverance, and the continuance and period of his life, were entirely at God's disposal: and, as he would not attempt to anticipate the Lord's appointed time, by killing Saul, he was persuaded that Saul could not succeed in his attempts to slay him; and that infinite wisdom and love would bring about his deliverance, and advancement to the throne, when the proper season was arrived.—Thus the counsels and decrees of the Jewish rulers against our Lord were continually disappointed for several years, because "his time was not yet come." (Notes, cxvi. 15. 1 Sam. xxvi. 8-12. Marg. Ref.)

V. 16. "Till my time of deliverance, let thy manifested presence and favour cheer my heart, and protect me, for the honour of thine abundant mercies." (Note, Num. vi. 24-26.)

V. 17, 18. These verses are future, "JEHOVAH, I shall not be ashamed, for I have called upon thee. The wicked shall be ashamed; they shall be silent in the grave." (or in the place of separate spirits, sheol, (Note, xvi. 8-11.) "The lying lips shall be silenced, which speak a grievous thing against the righteous man, with haughtiness and contempt." This way of expression certainly implies prayer, as well as prediction: but it is the language of triumphant confidence in God; and of assurance, that, however urgent, dangers or powerful enemies or temptations may be, the event shall be happy and glorious: and, thus considered, it is perfectly justified from the charge of malevolent imprecation; unless foreseeing and predicting the destruction of the wicked be malevolence. (Notes, v. 10, 11. xxxv. 25-28. lxxii. 1-3.)—The word righteous is singular: it especially marks David's strict integrity, while slandered with insolent contempt; as typical of the Just and Holy One of God, who was reviled far more haughtily and despitefully. (Note, Jam. v. 1-6. conclusion. 1 Pet. ii. 18-25. 2 and 3 Col.)

V. 19, 20. David, in the midst of his troubles and imminent perils, found encouragement in admiring the goodness of God to those whom he had taught to fear and trust in him. Many effects of this goodness are openly shewn "before the sons of men," in the deliverances wrought for his servants on earth: immensely more are "laid up" for them in heaven for their eternal happiness; but which will be at last conferred on them before the assembled world. (Notes, Is. lxiv. 4. Col. i. 3-8. iii. 1-4. 1 Pet. i. 3-5.) Here, the Lord preserves him by his powerful presence from their proud and envious foes, as in a "secret hiding-place;" and he will keep them, as in a royal pavilion; (Note, xxvii. 4-6;) from all the effects of those slanderous reproaches which are cast on them, by those who contend with them and persecute them. (Notes, 17, 18. Is. liv. 15-17.)

V. 21. Perhaps, David here referred to his deliverance, when Saul intended to have besieged him in Keilah: (Note, 1 Sam. xxiii. 7-13;) or he considered God's protection as the strongest fortress.

V. 22. In my haste. This seems especially suited to the hurry and agitation of the psalmist's mind, and the imperfection of his faith, when he found himself environed by his powerful foes in the cave, to which he had fled for shelter. (Notes, cxvi. 10, 11. 1 Sam. xxiii. 22-28.) Before he had time for reflection and prayer, he hastily gave up all for lost. But meditation on the promises which God had made to him, with earnest supplication, calmed his soul; and eventually his prayers were fully answered.

V. 23, 24. The deliverance of David, so far exceeding all human probability, might well encourage "his saints" (all who had experienced and learned to imitate the mercies of God,) to cleave to him in thankful admiring love: for it was evident that the Lord preserved believers in every danger, and punished, decidedly and awfully, all their proud and ungodly persecutors. No circumstances of danger or temptation, therefore, should deject them, or drive them from the path of duty: and in adhering to God, and relying on him, they would find their hearts supported and comforted with inward strength. (Notes, xxvii. 14. Luke xxii. 31-34. 2 Cor. i. 1-7.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1-8. The consciousness of trusting in God for every thing, on the warrant of his word, inspires confidence in danger, and suggests pleas in prayer: for it would not be honourable for the Lord, to leave those who thus rely on him to be ashamed of their hope. His justice induces him to deliver them from their unrighteous persecutors: his mercy, through the Redeemer's righteousness, will rescue them from final condemnation; and their earnest prayers will draw down promised blessings from their reconciled Father, as they stand in need of them. The Lord will protect and support all who flee to him as their "fortress," and build upon him as their "Rock of salvation:" for the honour of his name he will guide such as desire to be led in his holy ways: and He will extricate from perplexities, and deliver out of temptations, those that call upon him, to

PSALM XXXII.

David shews the happiness of a pardoned sinner, 1, 2: and that penitent confessions alone can relieve the misery of the guilty conscience, and make way for comfort, 3-7. He instructs and warns sinners to repent, and believers to rejoice in God, 8-11.

pluck their feet out of every net and snare, which Satan and wicked men have privily laid in their path.—Every true Christian, having learned the worth of his soul, and the dangers to which it is exposed, hath been led to intrust it as a sacred deposit to the care of the Almighty: but, considering his holiness and justice, and his own guilt and pollution, he would not dare to do so, did he not behold him as in Christ, his Redeemer, ready to forgive, and true to his covenant and promises. Thus encouraged, he continually commits his spirit into his hands, and, by daily experience, obtains a more firm persuasion of his power and willingness to save: and therefore, when death either seems to be at hand, or actually comes, he has confidence, in renewing this often-repeated transaction; and he desires to die resigning his spirit into the hands of his redeeming God. (Note, 2 Tim. i. 11, 12.) But they, who desire this comfortable assurance, must abhor the fellowship of all such as regard lying vanities; and renounce all idolatrous, superstitious, and carnal confidences, on which such immense numbers depend. They must rejoice in the mercy of God alone; and in every affliction remember, that he considers their trouble. They should treasure up, for future use, their experiences of his having noticed, supported, and comforted their souls in adversity; and having delivered them, when they thought they had been “shut up in the hands of their enemy,” for every deliverance is an earnest of the complete enlargement of the heavenly world. (Note, 2 Cor. i. 8-11.)

V. 9-24. In this present world, we may expect heavy trials: yet it is our infirmity, “if our life be spent with grief, and our years with sighing.” Should pain, sickness, poverty, reproach, contempt, and persecution, come upon us, with combined force: should our foes prevail, and our friends prove unfaithful, or afraid of owning or regarding us: should any be so degraded from honourable or useful stations, as to be “forgotten like a dead man,” or “thrown aside as a broken vessel:” should enmity unite with contempt, and slanderous accusation give countenance to conspiracy against our lives; we ought to remember that we have deserved more than all this, and be thankful for deliverance from the wrath to come. We should also consider the man after God’s own heart, and the treatment which he experienced; and especially we should “look unto Jesus,” who was divinely wise, holy, and merciful; yet was more hated, despised, slandered, and afflicted, than we can be. Let us then follow the example of his resignation; remembering “that our times are in his hand;” and that support, comfort, and deliverances will be vouchsafed wherever he pleases: nor can any suffering befall us otherwise than our heavenly Father has appointed. Whilst we therefore give ourselves to meditation and prayer, we may profitably observe how the lying lips of Saul, Doeg, Ahithophel, and Judas, were put to silence in the grave: and thus will all be confounded, who menace, slander, or speak grievous things, with arrogance and contempt against the righteous. Instead of yielding to impatience or despondency under our troubles; we should turn our thoughts to the surprising goodness of the Lord, towards those who fear and trust in him. For, whilst their treasure is laid up for them out of the reach of all their enemies, their bodies, souls, reputations, and comforts are under the protection of the Almighty; and they are kept as in a strong city, through faith unto salvation. We should not therefore yield to unbelief, or hastily conclude, under discouraging circumstances, that we are cut off from before the eyes of the Lord; but ask, and he will hear and deliver. He will preserve his faithful people through life; and when they meet the stroke of death, and yield their bodies to the grave, Jesus will receive their souls, and at length raise their bodies, and bring them to be for ever with him in glory. Let all his saints therefore pray to be enabled patiently to suffer, and courageously to venture, for his sake: for he will comfort and strengthen the hearts of all, who hope in him; whilst the proud despiser of his gospel, and persecutor of his people, shall meet with an abundant recompense of his evil deeds; and be for ever shut up, without possibility of release, in the hand of his cruel enemy, and in the unquenchable fire.—Lord, pardon our complaints and fears; increase our faith, patience, love, and gratitude; and teach us to rejoice in tribulation, and in hope of thine eternal glory!

NOTES.

PSALM XXXII. Maschil. This title seems to imply, that the psalm contains peculiarly important instruction: and indeed it teaches the way, by which miserable sinners become happy, and the nature and effects of true repentance: but, as twelve other psalms have the same title, the subjects of which are very different, some have thought that the word maschil shewed the music to which the psalm was set.—This is one of the seven penitential psalms: and though the special occasion of it is not mentioned, it is generally supposed to refer to David’s sin in the matter of Uriah, and his subsequent repentance. It seems to have been written some time after the fifty-first, and when God had “restored to him the joy of his salvation.” (Note, li. 12, 13.)

V. 1, 2. (Note, i. 1-3.) Sin is the only cause of misery; and forgiveness is the commencement of a sinner’s happiness: as he that had obtained the king’s pardon would be allowed to be the happiest, though the poorest, in a company of condemned malefactors. The believer’s transgressions of the Divine law are all forgiven, being covered with the atonement. Christ bare his iniquity; and therefore they are not imputed to the believer, as to any of their penal consequences: nay, “righteousness without works” is imputed, and as a righteous person, the reward is adjudged to him: hence all his present comforts, and hopes of future felicity. (Note, Rom. iv. 5-8.) But his character, as well as his privilege, is emphatically marked: “in his spirit there is no guile.” His professed repentance, faith, and love, are undissembled: he means what he says, when he confesses his sins, and prays to be delivered from them. He is no hypocrite or formalist in his worship; but is indeed the same before God that he appears to be before men; a sinner trusting in his mercy through the atoning blood, and seeking sanctification by the power of the Holy Spirit. He does not profess to repent, with intention to sin again; nor indulge in sin, because God is ready to forgive. Others will, but he cannot thus abuse the doctrine of free grace: he is “an Israelite indeed, in whom there is no guile.” (Notes, John i. 47-51. 1 Pet. ii. 1-3. Rev. xiv. 1-5. 3 Col.)—Happy, thrice happy is that man, to whom God will be pleased, out of his own free grace and mercy, (for no man can merit such a favour by any service he can do him,) to remit not only his common errors, but also his grossest sins.—“Who doth not only seem, by his sorrowful confessions, to hate and abhor them; but is unfeignedly resolved to forsake them.” (Bp. Patrick.)

V. 3-5. It seems that David, before Nathan came to him, had often been exceedingly tortured in his conscience, on account of the atrocious crimes which he had committed; (Notes, 2 Sam. xi. 27. xii. 1-6;) yet reluctance to humble himself before God, or to be considered as a criminal by men, led him to “keep silence,” or only to give vent to his anguish by solitary bemoanings, (“roaring as a lion which has received a deadly wound;”) and endeavouring, no doubt, at the same time, by one sophistical excuse or other, to palliate his guilt to himself, and to be on better terms with his conscience. But this stubborn and rebellious conduct served only to prolong and enhance his misery. His secret remorse and conflict, not only preyed on his spirit, but impaired his health, and rendered him infirm in his bones or limbs, as through old age. Neither business nor pleasure during the day, nor his couch by night, could relieve his inward anguish; which was rendered more exquisite by the pains taken to conceal it. Thus the hand of God was “heavy upon him.” (Marg. Ref.) and it is probable, some additional distressing malady was superadded to the natural effects of his inward conflicts; so that he, who was before vigorous and healthy, wasted away, till he resembled the parched land in the drouth of summer. But at length, being brought to a more proper frame of mind, he resolved humbly to submit himself to God, and to make full and ingenuous confession of his aggravated crimes, without attempting any excuse, or palliation; having done this, the “iniquity,” or injustice, of his sin was pardoned, his burden was speedily removed, and at length his comforts were restored; and he recorded these things with a mark of peculiar emphasis, Selah, that others might profit by his painful, and his joyful experience; (Notes, Jer. xxxi. 18-20. Luke xv. 14-24. 1 John i. 8-10.)—Hide, (5,) or covered. (Notes, 1, 2. Job xxxi. 33, 34. xxxviii. 13.) The impenitent covers his sin in vain: but God covers the sin of the penitent believer, effectually.

V. 6, 7. The word rendered “godly” is frequently translated “a saint,” and seems to mean one whom God favours. All that fear him, and, in humble submission desire his mercy, shew so far that right state of heart which springs from special grace: and such persons, hearing how readily God forgave the heinous guilt of David, when he was brought to ingenuous confession and deep repentance; would be encouraged to copy his example, and learn to pray in faith and hope, “in a time when God might be found.”—While his word is brought home to the conscience, and the Holy Spirit strives with the sinner, by painful convictions and terrors, or draws him to hope for mercy; it is especially “a time of finding,” (Marg.) “an acceptable time,” “a day of visitation,” a critical season in his experience. In some respects, this life is a “time of finding,” except to such as are judicially hardened: but in another world, God will no more be found on a mercy-seat, waiting to be gracious; but as an avenging judge to all the impenitent. (Notes, Is. xlix. 7, 8. lv. 6, 7. Luke xiii. 22-30. xix. 41-44. John xii. 34-36. 2 Cor. vi. 1, 2. Heb. iii. 7-13. 1 Pet. ii. 11.) They, however, who, as David supposed, might by his example be animated to seize the invaluable opportunity, would be received into favour; and, secure of protection, (like Noah in the ark, during the deluge,) could be approached by no overwhelming troubles, temptations, or enemies; or by those judgments and that vengeance, which overtook the wicked and hurried them into destruction. (Notes, Matt. vii. 24. Luke vi. 46—49.) In this happiness the psalmist rejoiced: and he daily received so many mercies, which he celebrated with songs of deliverance, that he was wholly compassed about with them.

V. 8—11. David, in the name of God, here offered to instruct those, who would regard him; and, by his experience and attention, to shew them the way of happiness, keeping his eye still upon them and counselling them. Or, the Lord himself, by his prophet, promises to be the teacher and watchful guide of all, who desired to walk in his ways. Some understand it, as the word of God to David, inducing him to repentance. When horses or mules prove refractory and mischievous, force and skill are used to subdue and restrain them: and they are exposed to much severe discipline, to render them tractable, and to prevent them from doing mischief, instead of service, to their possessors.—Thus obstinate sinners, in as irrational a manner, render sharp usage necessary, either to preserve them from ruin, or to restrain them from injuring others. So that their sorrows are multiplied, as the deliverances and praises of the righteous are enhanced. (Marg. Ref.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

All men would be happy: but they vainly expect that riches, pleasures, and worldly honours can confer satisfaction; and when disappointed, they change one vanity for another: so that he, and he alone, who attends to the word of God, seeks felicity successfully. His mercy, through the great Redeemer, revealed in the Scriptures, brings the first report of the sinner's happiness; faith receives this report, renounces worldly idols and false confidences, and seeks forgiveness and righteousness in the Saviour's name. But pride and stoutness of heart; aversion to God, and his holy character and spiritual worship; and unbelief, either absolutely, or to a considerable degree, prevailing in the heart; keep back from unreserved submission, ingenuous confession, and fervent prayer, numbers who are deeply distressed with a sense of guilt. They "keep silence," and brood in secret over their terrors and sorrows, which they endeavour to conceal under an assumed and hypocritical cheerfulness; while in solitude they feel, and sometimes mourn over, their misery, with horror and remorse, in the most doleful lamentations and fruitless wishes. In this way many are at length driven to despair and suicide: but far more seek relief from a condemning conscience, by having recourse to infidelity, or some corrupt system, which excuses or explains away the evil of sin; and so enables them to keep up a delusive hope of being happy, or at least of escaping misery, without "repentance, and works meet for repentance." When, however, God is pleased to visit the soul with his special grace, he sends his word, not only by a Nathan to the outward ear, with "Thou art the man;" but by his Holy Spirit to the inmost soul; (Note, 2 Sam. xii. 7.) and then godly sorrow, unfeigned submission, ingenuous confessions, and believing prayers for mercy and forgiveness through the atoning blood of Christ, soon make way for hope, and peace, and joy; and the justified believer tastes a happiness, of which before he had no conception; while he expatiates in praise of his present consolations, as contrasted with his preceding anguish, in a strain not unlike the encomiums on health of one recovering from a dangerous disease. Now he would have all his fellow-sinners hear of his happiness, that they may come and share it: and therefore he freely declares his own sentiments and experiences for their instruction: and his character is equally distant from that of the self-confident Pharisee, and the licentious Antinomian. Yet even this man may relax his vigilance, and fall into grievous sins, and even be led to "keep silence," in the same perverse and foolish manner, which he did before: so deceitful is the heart of man, and so powerful the influence of temptation operating on human depravity!—But lengthened and multiplied miseries here, or eternal ruin hereafter, must be the inevitable consequence of this mad contest of a helpless worm against Omnipotence. Our God is indeed far more ready to forgive, than we are humbly to seek his mercy: but he will continue to frown, to rebuke, and to correct, till his children kiss the rod, confess their sins, and implore forgiveness. Then he will rejoice in pardoning and comforting them; that they may feel, and so potence and omniscience, as much as the first creation of the world did. (Notes, Is. xiv. 24-27. xlv. 10, 11. Dan. iv. 34-37. Acts iv. 23-28. Eph. i. 9-12. iii. 9-12.) The 'counsels of states and empires are either directed to the accomplishment of the great counsel of heaven; or, if they attempt to thwart it, are blasted and brought to nothing. History will force all who read it with this view, to acknowledge thus much. And with this view indeed it should always be read.' (Bp. Horne.) The nation, therefore, which was distinguished as the chosen inheritance of this almighty Creator and universal Sovereign, possessed inestimable advantages above the worshippers of idols; and should rejoice in them and improve them. (Notes, cxlvii. 19, 20. Rom. iii. 1, 2.)

V. 13-15. The Lord, who formeth all hearts "as one;" or, he alone who fashions all hearts, and impartially decides concerning the works of all; is the witness as well as the judge of every man's conduct, throughout the whole earth. 'He formed their souls as well as their bodies; and therefore must needs see into their hearts, and be perfectly acquainted with every one of their thoughts.' (Bp. Patrick.) He also made the human species originally of the same nature; all are derived from the same stock; and all receive that nature impaired through the fall. The hearts of men, like their faces, have the same grand outlines, which are diversified through a variety of concurring circumstances; and the one heart, (the same views, judgment, disposition, and affections,) is given to all, who are renewed by the Holy Spirit, with merely circumstantial differences, in things of smaller consequence. (Note, Jer. xxxii. 39-41.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

Rejoicing in the Lord, as our father and friend, is the genuine effect of humiliation and mourning for sin: for being justified by faith, and walking uprightly before him, joy is our privilege and duty. It becomes us to abound in cheerful praises; it is suited to our character, and ornamental to our profession, and honourable to God. But the joy of the hypocrite springs from presumption, and his praises are an offence and affront to the Lord.—Every endowment which we possess, should be employed, with all our skill and earnestness, in the service of the Giver, and we should be avowed in our worship; but well-regulated, and heavenly affections are most harmonious and acceptable. (Notes, Eph. v. 15-20. Col. iii. 16, 17.)—Every part of his word is holy, just, and good, and very useful to the upright. (Note, Mic. ii. 6, 7;) and all his works are done in truth, correspond to the prophecies and promises of the Scripture, and are, in one way or other, a fulfilment of them.—Though the Lord delighteth in righteousness and judgment; yet the earth, which is full of man's wickedness, is filled also with his goodness: yea, his most abundant mercy consists perfectly with his most awful justice. The formation of the earth, and the separation of the waters in the ocean, as a vast reservoir for the use of man, proclaim the wisdom, power, and goodness of the Creator, and, as they encourage the believer to expect the largest blessings from his almighty Friend, they call on all the inhabitants of the earth to stand in awe of him, and to fear his tremendous indignation. For, as "he spake, and it was done," when the world was made; his mandate will be equally efficacious, when he shall command the destruction of his enemies; and such are all, who will not leave the Saviour to reign over them. (Note, Matt. xxv. 41-46. Luke xix. 11-27.) All human power and policy are ineffectual against his omnipotent

PSALM XXXIV.

David praises God, and exhorts others, from his own experience, to bless and trust in him, 1-10. He teaches the fear of God; and contrasts the privileges of the righteous with the miseries of the wicked, 11-22.

4 Psalm of David, when he changed his behaviour before <sup>a</sup>Abimelech; who drove him away, and he departed.

I WILL <sup>b</sup>bless the LORD at all times: his praise shall continually be in my mouth.

2 My soul shall <sup>c</sup>make her boast in the LORD: <sup>d</sup>the humble shall hear <sup>e</sup>thereof, and be glad.

3 <sup>f</sup>O magnify the LORD with me, and <sup>g</sup>let us exalt his name together.

4 <sup>h</sup>I sought the LORD, and he heard me, and delivered me <sup>i</sup>from all my fears.

5 <sup>j</sup>They looked unto him, <sup>k</sup>and were <sup>l</sup>lightened; and <sup>m</sup>their faces were not ashamed.

6 <sup>n</sup>This poor man cried, and the LORD heard <sup>o</sup>him, and <sup>p</sup>saved him out of all his troubles.

will: "his counsel shall stand, and he will do all his pleasure;" and his vengeance against the ungodly will be everlasting.—But blessed are his people, who have him for their portion, and are his chosen inheritance; who worship and serve him, live under his protection, and enjoy his favour! We possess the outward means of this blessing: may he visit our souls with salvation, and new-create us unto holiness! For he, who formed man's heart, cannot be imposed upon by any appearances.—All confidence, except in his mercy, is vain. Powerful armies, personal strength and valour, or the force and speed of a horse, are unavailing for outward safety, without his protection. The event of battles, and the fate of kingdoms, are determined by his sovereign will, who considereth the works of men, and acteth with perfect wisdom and justice. All human devices are ineffectual for the salvation of our souls; but the Lord's watchful eye is over those who unite the conscientious fear of his name, with a believing hope in his mercy through the great Redeemer. He will preserve their lives, and supply their temporal wants, as far as is good for them; and he will feed their souls and preserve them from eternal death. May he teach us to say from our hearts, "Our soul waiteth for the LORD, he is our help and shield." Then shall "we rejoice in him, because we have trusted in his holy name." For "his mercy will surely be upon us, according as we hope in him."

NOTES.

PSALM XXXIV. Title. (Note, 1 Sam. xxi. 10-15.) Achish was the name of the king of Gath, and "Abimelech," which signifies, my father, the king, seems to have been a general title to all the kings of Philistia, as Pharaoh, and afterwards Ptolemy, was of the Egyptian kings.—This psalm is curiously composed, according to the number and order of the letters of the Hebrew alphabet, in the beginning of each verse; which shews that it was contrived when he, (David,) reflected on his escape, in some place of safety. (Bp. Patrick. Notes, Is. xxxviii. 9-13. Jon. ii. 1, 2.)

V. 1, 2. (Notes, cxlv. 1, 2. cxlvi. 2. Phil. iv. 5-7. 3 Col. Col. iii. 16, 17. 1 Thes. v. 15-22. 2 Col. Heb. xiii. 15, 16.) Whilst the psalmist publicly declared the power and goodness of God, in delivering him from extreme danger, and gloried in him as his omnipotent father and friend; he rejoiced to think, that other pious persons in distress, would be raised above discouragement, and filled with cheerful hope, by this record of his experience. The event, during almost three thousand years, has fully verified this expectation.—The word rendered humble, is afterwards translated poor, (6.) It seems applicable either to poverty and affliction borne with meek submission; or to the lowly sense, which true believers have of their unworthiness; and poverty in spiritual things, which renders them teachable, dependent, and thankful. (Notes, Is. lxvi. 1, 2. Matt. v. 3.)

V. 4-6. When the psalmist understood, that he was considered, in the court of Achish, as the enemy of the Philistines, who was now in their power, his fears were very great; as the method by which he sought to extricate himself clearly shews. He was, however, delivered; and ascribed his escape to a peculiar interposition of God; which eventually still more encouraged his faith and hope. And he realizes to himself the effects of these events on others, who would look to God, in distress and danger, or 'flow unto him,' and find comfort and safety; while they conversed together on the case of David: and he calls on all, to join him in extolling the name and celebrating the praises of his gracious deliverer; as unable to do it adequately himself.

V. 7. (Notes, Gen. xxiv. 2-9.) 'Though God's power be all-sufficient, yet for man's infirmity, he appointeth his angels to watch over us.' (Marg. Ref.) The singular number being here used; many think, with great probability, that Christ, "the great angel of the covenant," was intended. (Notes, Gen. xxxii. 30. xlviii. 16. Ex. iii. 2. Hos. xii. 4-6. Mal. iii. 1-4.)

V. 8. The apostle applies this expressly to Jesus Christ. (Note, 1 Pet. ii. 1-3.)—The experience, which faith makes way for, of the Lord's faithfulness and goodness, may be compared to the evidence received by the senses concerning their respective objects. The believer tastes, and sees, that God is good, as he perceives that honey is sweet, the light pleasant, and the landscape beautiful. This is no longer a matter of reasoning or expectation; but of actual enjoyment, in which he cannot be deceived. (Notes, lxiii. 5, 6. cxix. 103. 1 John i. 1-3. v. 9, 10. Marg. Ref.)

V. 9, 10. 'God is never wanting to provide for his servants, what he seeth needful and best, in matters temporal; while tyrants and oppressors, who are in the world what lions are in a forest, are often, by the just judgment of heaven, reduced to want that which they have ravished from others.' (Horne.) (Notes, lxxxiv. 11, 12. Is. xl. 27-31. Matt. vi. 33, 34.)

V. 11-14. The Psalmist, having addressed "the saints," or such as were established in the way of holiness; next exhorts young persons, or new converts, as children, or sons, beloved sons. Though he was a person of high rank, renowned for military valour and success, anointed to be a king, and eminent in music, poetry, and every accomplishment; he was desirous of teaching children; for youth is the learning and remembering season; and what first occupies the mind lasts the longest. He did not, however, attempt to teach them music, poetry, arts, or arms; but "the fear of the Lord," its nature and effects. He had been shewing the blessedness of those who feared God, and he wished his young friends to share these blessings.—Many as his engagements, and great as his difficulties and dangers, were, he would spare time, and find spirits, to teach children the fear of the Lord!—The manner, in which the apostle quotes this passage, demonstrates that such exhortations perfectly coincide with evangelical principles. (Note, 1 Pet. iii. 2-12.)—True religion begins in the fear of God, in dread of his anger, and hope and desire of his favour; and it hath the promise both of this world and the next. Whether men would live long and happy on earth, or for ever in heaven, the tongue must be bridled; profane, licentious, slanderous, flattering, proud, and deceitful language, must be refrained from; all sin must be repented of and renounced; every duty attended to; peace with God, and peace with all men, must be pursued: indeed "the grace of God, that bringeth salvation," effectually teaches men to attend to these things; and the contrary conduct will ensure temporal and eternal misery: without them faith is dead; by them it is evidenced to be living and justifying. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 15-17. The Lord takes special notice of his people's wants, difficulties, and prayers; and watches over them with unremitting vigilance, proportioning the communication of his strength and consolations to their need of them. (Note, 2 Chr. xvi. 7-10.) But he sets himself decidedly against the impenitent; and his frown alone is sufficient to sink them in misery, oblivion, or ignominy. (Note, Lev. xvii. 10-16.)—'The death of martyrs is their deliverance; and the greatest of all deliverances.' (Horne.) This is true of the death of every believer, by whatever means effected: then "the Lord delivers him out of all his troubles."

V. 18. The "broken in heart" and "contrite in spirit," in the language of Scripture, are not those who, being weighed down by sorrows and sufferings, through impatience and despondency, sink under them; but such as are broken-hearted under a sense of their sins, and led to renounce all self-confidence. Their hearts, naturally stout, hard, and unfeeling, are humbled, softened, and made sensibly alive to the feelings of remorse, fear, shame, godly sorrow, and self-abhorrence. Their self-will also is subdued; they submit to God, without plea or hope, save in his mercy and grace. They are prepared to welcome his gospel, and exclusively possess its blessings. (Notes, li. 17. Is. lvii. 15, 16. lxxvi. 1, 2. Ez. xi. 17-20. xxxvi. 25-27.)

V. 19, 20. (Notes, lxxi. 20-21. Prov. xxiv. 15, 16. John xvi. 31-33. 1 Thes. iii. 1-5. 2 Tim. iv. 16-11. 1 Pet. v. 8-11. Rev. vii. 13-17.)—God so preserves the believer, in the most perilous circumstances, that not a bone is broken

PSALM XXXV.

David prays that God would fight against his enemies; and anticipates their confusion, and his triumph over them, 1-10. He complains of their calumny, malice, and ingratitude; blending supplications and appeals to God, 11-22. He renews his prayers and predictions, 23-25.

A Psalm of David.

without his wise and merciful appointment; nay, "the hairs of his head are all numbered," and not "one falleth to the ground, without God." (Note, Matt. x. 29-31.) Every thing subserves his final good, and both soul and body will be preserved and perfected for glory. (Notes, xxxv. 10. Rom. viii. 28-32. Phil. iii. 20, 21.)—Not a bone of the Saviour was broken at his crucifixion, though it was customary to break the bones of crucified persons, and the two thieves had their legs broken. (Notes, John xix. 31-37.)

V. 21, 22. "Desolation," means utter destruction, whether of nations as such, or of individuals. The desolation of the several kingdoms which have persecuted the church, and that of the Jews who crucified the Saviour, "hating that righteous One," with the preservation insured to true Christians, form a striking exposition of these verses. (Marg. Ref. Notes, xxxvii. 10-15. xl. 14-16. Rom. viii. 28-37. 1 Thes. ii. 13-16. 2 Thes. i. 5-12. Rev. v. 8-10. xx. 11-15.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

It is our duty to bless the Lord at all times—in pain, sickness, poverty, persecution, and even in the agonies of death. He is always worthy of our love and praise; we are always receiving more good from him than we have deserved; and the viler we are, the more cause have we to adore his condescending goodness to us.—It encourages the humble believer, and silences the proud Pharisee, when the servants of God are enabled to rejoice, and make their boast in him, under circumstances of the most extreme danger, and the deepest distress; and if our faith were strong, we might thus call on all around us to magnify and exalt our God with us, extolling his glorious excellencies, and celebrating the praises of his abundant mercy.—Whilst others consider how one poor tempted soul has been comforted and delivered, they, too, are encouraged to look unto the Lord; and their hearts grow cheerful, and their faith gathers strength. But we should especially look to Him, "who, though he was rich, for our sakes became poor;" and remember how he suffered, and how he is glorified, in order to save all that trust in him.—They must be safe and happy, "who fear the Lord." The holy angels minister to them, yea, the great Angel of the covenant encampeth continually around them, to protect and deliver them. Oh, that sinners would but make trial of his love! Their own experience would convince them, that the blessings of salvation are sweeter than all the pleasures upon earth. But even the saints need exhortations to the reverential fear of God; the more humbly and obediently they walk with him, the happier they are; and they who "seek first the kingdom of God, and his righteousness," shall never want any good thing; whilst the covetous and rapacious, who resemble ravenous beasts, shall at length be left utterly destitute. Let, then, all who have themselves "tasted that the Lord is gracious," take delight in leading others, and especially the young, into these happy ways, by no means thinking the instruction even of little children beneath them. Let young persons set out in life with learning the fear of the Lord, if they desire true comfort here, and eternal happiness hereafter; for they are the happiest who begin the soonest to serve so good a master. But let them attend to him, who "speaketh unto them as unto children," that they may learn the true fear of God, and beware of counterfeits. That religion promises best which begins with the conscience, and creates a watchfulness over the heart and tongue; a dread and hatred of hypocrisy and all sin, and a love of peace and universal holiness. Such a state of heart prepares the way for the proper understanding and reception of Divine truths; and they who thus receive, will "adorn the doctrine of God our Saviour;" he will peculiarly regard them, and attend to their prayers; whilst he fights against the evil-doer, whatever be his profession; and oblivion, or infamy, will be his present and eternal portion.—Nothing is more essential to true godliness, than a contrite heart, broken off from every kind of self-confidence and self-preference, and crushed down into the dust of self-abasement: in this soil every grace flourishes; and to this contrite person nothing can give encouragement, but the free mercy of the gospel of Jesus Christ. Such characters meet with many afflictions, and are harassed by temptations, for their trial and profit; "but the Lord will deliver them out of them all:" whilst the ungodly will sink under one trouble after another, to rise no more; for "evil shall slay the wicked."—He, that accomplished the prophecies concerning the Saviour, so that "not a bone of him was broken" by all his furious enemies; will take equal care of all his faithful servants, and destroy all their persecutors. He will redeem his people from hell and from the grave, and will not forsake those who trust in him, till they possess a happiness large as their capacities, durable as their immortality, and surpassing their most sanguine expectations.

NOTES.

PSALM XXXV. V. 1-3. 'This psalm, we are sufficiently informed by the matter of it, was penned by David, when he was fiercely persecuted by Saul, whose forces, which were unjustly raised against him, he beseeches the Lord to dissipate; and especially to stop the mouth of his false accusers, such as Doeg and the Ziphites. (Bp. Patrick.) 'So long as Saul was an enemy to David, all that had any authority under him, to flatter their king, (as is the course of the world,) did also most cruelly persecute David.' (Notes, 1 Sam. xxii. xxiii.)—It is likewise evident, that the psalmist was led by the Holy Spirit, to speak of his own case in language, which was more emphatically applicable to the divine Saviour, and to his sufferings.—'Albeit God can with his breath destroy all the wicked; yet the Holy Ghost attributeth to him all these outward weapons, to assure us of his present power.' (Notes, Ex. xv. 3. Num. xxii. 23-27. Josh. v. 13-15.)

Say, &c. (3.) 'Assure me against these temptations, that 'thou art the author of my salvation.'

V. 4-9. All the verbs, in these verses, in the original, are in the future, as a prediction; though they stand in most translations and paraphrases, ancient and modern, in the imperative, as an imprecation. No doubt, there are many instances, in which such denunciations stand in the form of petitions; and, considered as the language of inspired men, respecting the inveterate enemies of God, and Christ, and religion, no reasonable objection can be made against them.—It is not, however, desirable, to understand any passages in this strong sense, which far more obviously express one of more general application. The verses under consideration are simply a prediction, that David's enemies would, by their unprovoked, assiduous, and crafty devices to take away his life, bring on themselves the deepest infamy, along with unexpected and inevitable ruin; and that his trials would terminate in thanksgiving and rejoicing. (Notes, 25-28. v. 10, 11.)—As light chaff cannot resist the force of the wind; so the psalmist's persecutors would not be able to withstand the power and justice of God; whose angel encamped around the righteous to protect them, and would drive their dismayed and bewildered assailants headlong into the pit of destruction. (Notes, i. 4-6. xxxiv. 7. Ex. xiv. 19. 24, 25.) One in particular, (probably Saul,) would perish in that very destruction, which he had, without any cause, nay, contrary to his deserts, intended for David. (Notes, 11, 12. John xv. 22-25.) He took counsel to take off David in battle against the Philistines, and he died in battle against them; which made way for the psalmist's complete deliverance. (Note, vii. 14-16.) In like manner, Ahithophel and Absalom brought ruin on themselves by their counsel against David; (Notes, 2 Sam. xv. 31. xvi. 20-23. xvii. 1-14. 23. xviii. 9-14:) and so did Judas, and the Jewish rulers, and the nation, by opposing Christ; of whom David, in this psalm especially, seems to have spoken, as a type or representative. Indeed, the whole Scripture predicts the final ruin of all the impenitent enemies of God and religion, and that of Satan, their great leader: (Notes, Rev. xxi. 17-21. xx. 1-3. 7-10:) and the intercession of Christ, the prayers of his church, and the ministration of angels; while they tend to complete the salvation and joy of his people, concur in accomplishing the prophecies which foretell the destruction of his enemies.—'A traveller, benighted in a bad road, is an expressive emblem of a sinner walking in the slippery and dangerous ways of temptation; whilst an enemy is in pursuit of him, whom he can neither resist nor avoid.' (Horne.)

V. 10. The psalmist frequently complains, under his trials and chastisements, of broken bones, and that his bones waxed old, &c.; (Marg. Ref;) because his whole frame was sensibly affected. In like manner, he considers himself, in body as well as in soul, so revived by his deliverance, that every bone would concur in admiring his deliverer and his unrivalled excellence.—Christ was raised from the dead, so that not one of his bones was broken: every member of his mystical body shall be forthcoming at the general resurrection; and every believer now has, and shall then have, cause to praise the Lord for taking care of his soul and body, in every part, and in all respects. (Notes, xxii. 16-18. xxxiv. 20.)—Saul was too powerful for poor David; Christ was made poor, and a man of sorrows, and had no armed force to oppose to the power of the Jews and Romans; and Satan and other enemies are too strong for the believer.

V. 11, 12. The very persons, whom David had befriended when he was in prosperity, after he had been proscribed by Saul, bare cruel witness against him, and demanded that punishment should be inflicted on him for alleged acts of treason, of which he had not the least consciousness.—This was far more emphatically accomplished in the great antitype. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 13, 14. The psalmist next contrasts his conduct in respect of his persecutors, with that towards him of the very persons to whom he had rendered the most important services.—The nature of fasting, as an occasional voluntary act of self-abasement, submission to God under adverse dispensations, sorrow for sin as the cause of sufferings, and self-discipline in order to self-government, is illustrated by the expression, "I humbled," or afflicted, or chastened, "myself with fasting." (Notes, Lev. xvi. 29-31. Matt. ix. 14, 15. P. O. 9-17.)—The conduct of the psalmist's foes showed, as he feared, that his prayers for them had not been answered; but he was satisfied that at length they would return into his own bosom. The original is future, (shall return;) and as David was still conflicting with trials, and anticipating deliverance; the future best suits his case.—He thus mourned over the afflictions of Saul and of Israel, with fasting and prayer: and Christ wept over Jerusalem, and fasted, prayed, and suffered for sinners, as for a friend, a brother, or a parent; and he prayed for his crucifiers, when about to expire amidst their cruelty and contempt. (Notes, Matt. iv. 1, 2. Luke xix. 41-44. xlii. 32-38.)

V. 15, 16. When David was persecuted by Saul, or when he made any false step, as they supposed, (Marg.) they who had before envied him rejoiced; the most abject persons, from whom he had least expected it, or who were too obscure to be known by him, conspired to do him mischief; (as if the lame should ridicule a man for halting;) his name was torn with incessant reproaches and false accusations; he was their sport at feasts; whilst they, who flattered others, in order to be feasted by them; or who were maintained by diverting the company, and personating and turning to ridicule the character of their neighbours, made him their constant subject; yet their contempt was united with most cruel and desperate rage.—All this was far more emphatically true of Christ, and the treatment with which he met from the hypocritical Jews, and from the most abject persons, not excepting the crucified malefactors who reviled him on the cross. (Notes, Is. liii. 2. 3. Matt. xxvi. 63-68. xxvii. 27-31. 39-44.)—The hypocritical priests and scribes, who mocked Jesus, were at the same time keeping the feast of unleavened bread.

PSALM XXXVI.

The corrupt principles and practices of wicked men, 1-4. An admiring view of the mercy and justice of God, and of the felicity of his people, 5-9. David prays for his brethren and himself; and in faith triumphs over the workers of iniquity, 10-12.

To the chief Musician, A Psalm of David, <sup>a</sup>the servant of the LORD.

by his almighty power: then all our bones shall, as it were, praise our deliverer, who hath rescued us poor and needy sinners from sin, Satan, and death: enemies far too strong for us.—Whilst in faith we anticipate this glorious event of our trials, let us prepare for the cross in this world. When we consider the ingratitude, contempt, and hatred, with which the holy Jesus was treated, in return for his unspeakable love: when we remember how the multitudes, who had witnessed, or even shared, his benign miracles, rejoiced in his adversity; how the very abjects, collected round his cross, insulted him, and even gnashed their teeth at him; and how the scribes and Pharisees treated his sacred person with blasphemous ridicule and mockery; even whilst they were hypocritically observing the feast of the passover, as if zealous for the honour of God and religion: when we meditate on these scenes, we shall not “marvel if the world hate us;” if we be despised, abused, reviled, falsely accused, and treated with indignity and ingratitude, by those whom we have most loved, and could not have suspected; and who even profess to serve God. Let us then learn to possess our souls in patience and meekness; like the Saviour, let us persevere in praying for our enemies, and attempting to do them good: and acting towards them with compassion and affection, in hopes of overcoming evil with good. If this have not the desired effect, our prayer will bring down blessings on our own souls; and if that mind were in us which was in him, we could not but be grieved to think of the tremendous ruin, that hangs over the heads of our impatient injurers.—He, who hath exalted the once-suffering Redeemer, will in due time appear for all his people: the roaring lion shall not destroy their souls, which they have entrusted to the hands of their Surety; they are one with him, and precious in his sight, and shall be rescued from every peril and destruction; that with him they may give thanks in the great congregation above. Let us then give ourselves unto prayer, and study to be quiet in the land, however injured or deceived. Thus our enemies shall never triumph in our destruction; and their rejoicing over our temporal calamities shall be short-lived, as was that of the Jewish rulers over the crucified Redeemer.—But let us chiefly fear lest they should rejoice at beholding us betrayed into sin, and disgracing our profession. This would please them more, than seeing us cast into a fiery furnace, and they would exclaim, “Aha, aha, our eye hath seen it, so would we have it!” Then indeed they, who hate us without cause, would wink with their eyes, encouraging each other’s blasphemies; and open wide their mouths to proclaim our infamy, to the reproach of our religion. This the Lord knoweth, and as his glory is concerned, let us call upon him, intreating him not to be far from us; but constantly to uphold us, that Satan and his servants may not thus magnify themselves against us. In all things let us act conscientiously, and leave our cause with God. And, whilst we expect to see the opposers of Christ “clothed with shame and dishonour;” let us pray that all, who favour his righteous cause, may rejoice, and be continually praising God: and let us remember, that he hath pleasure in the prosperity of all his servants; that we may be speaking of his righteousness and praise all the day long.

NOTES.

PSALM XXXVI. V. 1. David was as much convinced by the conduct of wicked men, that they were not habitually possessed by the fear of God, as if it had been immediately spoken to his heart: and his knowledge of the deceitfulness and evil of his own heart, aided him in discovering the source of other men’s wickedness. If the terrors of God for a moment affrighted them, they soon cast them behind their backs, or they could not have gone on in their daring crimes. (Notes, cxii. Neh. v. 14-18. Prov. xvi. 6. Ec. xii. 11-14. Rom. iii. 9-18.)—It is probable, that Saul was especially meant, as the wicked man who persecuted “David, the servant of the LORD,” with persevering enmity; yet he frequently cloaked his malice with professions of friendship, and still kept up an outward regard to religion. The psalm seems to have been written, soon after Saul began to shew his hatred to David.

V. 2. The wicked man not only disguises his crimes or intentions from others: but, through the excess of self-love, he becomes his own flatterer, calls his vices by soft names, or mistakes them for virtues; and deems his conduct justifiable, perhaps meritorious, when in fact it is a hateful compound of impiety, injustice, and malevolence, and will very soon be proved to be so.—Thus Saul’s self-flattery kept him from being aware of the malignity of his conduct, till he became odious in the open view of mankind. (Notes, 1 Sam. xv. 13-28. xxii. 6-19. xxv. 23-31. 1 Chr. x. 13, 14.)

V. 17-19. (Notes, xxii. 6-24.) The exact agreement of the language, used in these verses, with that of the passage referred to, favours the opinion that this psalm also is a direct prophecy of the Messiah. The psalmist, however, seems evidently to have spoken of his own concerns, though carried beyond himself by the Spirit of prophecy, to use language applicable to far more important transactions.—Translating the nineteenth verse in connexion with the context, gives it additional force. “I will praise thee among much people.—Mine enemies shall not wrongfully rejoice over me, or they wink with the eye, who hate me without a cause.” It is the language of assured faith and hope, rather than of either prediction, or imprecation.—The original is future. (Notes, 4-9. 25-28.)

V. 20. “They are men of a turbulent spirit, that give not their sovereign peaceable counsels, but devise false stories, to incense him against such as would gladly serve God quietly, under his government, without doing the least harm to any body.” (Bp. Patrick.)—David would have lived quietly under the government of Saul; our Lord did not aim at temporal government; nor did the primitive Christians intermeddle with the politics of the world: yet all were betrayed, mocked, and persecuted, as rebels and usurpers, and pests of society.” (Horne.)

V. 21, 22. They boldly accuse me as a traitor,—“saying, So, so, we have found him out; his reasonable practices are discovered, we ourselves are eye-witnesses of it.” (Bp. Patrick.)—The appeal of David to God, the ever-present witness of his conduct, and the prayer grounded on it, have a peculiar energy, when viewed in this connexion. (Notes, xl. 14. 17. Matt. xxvi. 63-68.)

V. 23, 24. (Notes, vii. 6-11. xliii. 23-26. Is. li. 9-11. Marg. Ref.)

V. 25-28. All these verses are in the future tense, and, in my opinion, (which I offer with very great diffidence, and hesitation, on such a subject, and in opposition to almost all versions ancient and modern,) are more expressive, and lie less open to objection, when thus translated. No doubt, the other rendering accords to the idiom of the language; yet it is by no means necessary: and what is lost by thus rendering the original, most literally? “Judge me, O LORD, my God, in thy righteousness; and they will not rejoice over me. They will not say in their hearts, So would we have it:” (it is as our souls desired:.) “They will not say, We have swallowed him up. They will be ashamed and confounded together, who rejoice in my shame. They will be clothed with shame and dishonour, that magnify themselves against me. They will shout for joy and be glad, that favour my righteous cause,” &c. The twenty-eighth verse is literally rendered; and the others might, with equal propriety, and with more energy, be translated in the same manner. (Notes 4-9. 17-19.) The clamours against David, as cursing his enemies, when considered as an objection to the Scriptures, is indeed irrational; for it assumes the point in question, and determines that he spake in his own spirit, and not as moved by the Holy Spirit; yet it is not desirable to give occasion even to irrational and impious objections. (Marg. Ref.)—How applicable is the whole passage to the Saviour’s sufferings and triumphs, and to the consequences of them! (Notes, xli. 4-8. lvi. 1, 2.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The believer is admitted into a covenant of friendship with his God: and they, who strive with him, fight against his omnipotent ally; whose presence and assistance will more effectually defend his servants, and annoy their persecutors, than the most powerful hosts of well-armed valiant men. If he say to each of our souls, “I am thy salvation;” if he shew us, that our sins, are pardoned and subdued; we have nothing to fear; but may confidently predict the confusion and ruin of every seducer, or persecutor, who seeks to destroy our lives, or souls, or in any way to do us hurt.—We must not desire the ruin of any enemies, except our lusts, and those evil spirits who would compass our destruction: yet we ought fervently and constantly to pray for the desolation of all the inveterate enemies of Christ our anointed King. Assuredly, they will at length be thrown as chaff into the fire; yea, driven in a dark and slippery path, by the angels of God, into the bottomless pit; and their crafty and unwearied enmity, against the holy Jesus and his harmless followers, will involve them in unexpected and inevitable misery. Let then the persecuted and afflicted believer rejoice in the salvation of the Lord. His preservation is insured by the Saviour’s resurrection and exaltation; who will shortly “change our vile bodies, and make them like his own glorious body,”

V. 3, 4. Saul, in the beginning of his reign, behaved wisely, and performed good services to his people: but he soon began to act foolishly, and to disobey God; and at length he entirely ceased to use his understanding to do good. (Notes, i Sam. xi. xxviii. 3-10.) He became a treacherous and cruel persecutor of David: and, while he perhaps ascribed his conduct in throwing his javelin at him, to a sudden paroxysm of disease; David was aware that he most deliberately, and in his most retired hours, plotted his destruction; and had no aversion in his heart to any wickedness, however abominable, though he tried to cloke his malice by plausible professions. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 5-9. The psalmist here contrasted the Divine perfections and government, with the conduct of wicked men, especially when in power. The mercy of God is immensely large; and, having filled the earth with its effects, it fills the heavens also, by the admission of redeemed sinners to that blessed state. His faithfulness reaches far above the shifting clouds, and is liable to no mutability or failure. His justice is placed on an immovable basis, and he never varies from it: yet his judgments, or decrees, are unfathomably deep, to be adored and not comprehended by us. (Notes, lvii. 7-11. lxxi. 19. lxxxvii. 19, 20. lxxxix. 1-4. xcii. 2, 3-5. xcvi. 2. c. ciii. 11-15. cxlv. 1-7. 17. Job xxxvii. 23, 24. Rom. xi. 33-36.) The Creator's care sustains, and "preserves," both man and beast: and his immeasurable lovingkindness, in its varied exercises, encourages even the guilty and polluted sons of Adam to trust in his mercy, and to confide in his protection. (Note, Ruth ii. 11, 12. Marg. Ref.) In this refuge, and in his service, believers find abundant consolation, and drink "pleasures as from a river" flowing from the Fountain of life and felicity: and in the knowledge and favour of God, they see light and glory inexpressible. (Notes, xlv. 4. Rev. vii. 13-17. xxi. 22-27. xxii. 1-6.) The word rendered pleasures, (8,) is the plural of Eden.—In heaven alone the thirst of an immortal soul after happiness can be satisfied. There the streams of Eden will flow again. (Horne.)

V. 10, 11. David was conscious of integrity, and had been favoured with much experience of the Lord's faithful and merciful care; but his dangers and troubles, were multiplied, and all who knew God, and uprightly served him, were in a measure involved in his difficulties. (Note, i Chr. xxviii. 9.) He therefore prayed, that the favour shewn to him and them, might be prolonged according to the faithful promises of God; and that he would judge in righteousness, between his persecuted servants and their unrighteous persecutors. Then, says he, "The foot of pride shall not come against me; and the hand of the wicked shall not cast me down." "I shall be preserved from the scornful oppression, and iniquitous power, of every enemy." (Marg. Ref.)

V. 12. 'Faith calleth things that are not, as though they were; it carries us forward to the end of time; it shews us the Lord sitting on the throne of judgment, the righteous caught up to meet him in the air; the world in flames under his feet, and the empire of sin fallen to rise no more.' (Horne.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

To be the servant of the Lord is the highest privilege and honour, to which we can aspire; and they, who are advanced to eminent stations in society, should glory to fill them up, as serving God and his church in them.—All the wickedness of men springs from contempt and forgetfulness of God: their actions speak more plainly than their words: and when they commit atrocious crimes without remorse, or habitually live in the practice of any sin, we may be sure, "that there is no fear of God before their eyes;" and that they habitually despise his favour and defy his wrath. But proud and ignorant men deceive themselves, and verily think their conduct excusable, when it is indeed most hateful; let us then daily beg of God to preserve us from self-flattery, and to bring us acquainted with our own character, that we may judge and condemn ourselves, and not finally be condemned at his tribunal.—When such as have appeared to be religious leave off to behave wisely and to do good, they will soon be drawn into grosser crimes; and the deceitful and corrupt language of their lips will betray the desperate wickedness of their hearts.—If we willingly banish holy meditations, in our solitary hours, Satan will soon occupy our minids with polluting and mischievous imaginations: and if any yield frequently to sudden temptations, they will at length deliberately "devise mischief upon their beds."—Whatever be a man's outward conduct, if he do not abhor evil, he is no true penitent: and if he do not set himself heartily to walk in the ways of godliness, he will soon return to the more direct road to temporal and eternal destruction.—The servants of God must expect much trouble from apostates and wicked men; but they may comfort themselves by contemplating the perfections of their Almighty Friend. His merciful promises engage to every believer the enjoyment of heavenly happiness; his unfailling faithfulness guarantees the engagement; his immovable justice harmonizes with his truth and love; and his most mysterious appointments are the result of his infinite wisdom and goodness. Whilst all his creatures share his bounty and protection; his compassion and mercy, and the provisions of his redeeming love, are so immense, and of such inestimable value, that the chief of sinners may come to him, and receive pardon and peace, and put their trust under the shadow of his wings. Thither the alarmed and penitent flee for safety, perhaps imagining that they are thus renouncing all enjoyment in this present world; but they soon find, if decided and diligent, true happiness in the favour and service of God: the provisions of his house are rich and plenteous; and the consolations of his Spirit, communicated through his ordinances, are an earnest of heavenly joys. This "river of the water of life proceedeth from the throne of God and of the Lamb;" and they must be happy, who have access to "the fountain of life." (Note, Rev. xxi. 5-8.) Indeed, God is the source of felicity; but fallen man has forsaken him, and is miserable. In Christ, however, this fountain is accessible; "wells of salvation" are opened for us by the gospel; and sinners, returning to God according to it, see and enjoy light and felicity, in their source and perfection. (Note, Is. xii. 3.)—May we then know, and love, and uprightly serve the Lord! Then shall we be interested in the prayers of all his people, and learn to love and pray for them: and his lovingkindness will be continued to us through the intercession of our heavenly Advocate. Then shall no proud enemy, on earth or from hell, come against us, to trample upon us, or to separate us from his love; but we shall be established in felicity, when all the workers of iniquity are cast down to rise no more for ever.

NOTES.

PSALM XXXVII. V. 1, 2. It is probable, that this psalm was written towards the close of David's life, as the result of his long experience and observation, for the instruction and encouragement of others, who might be called to pass through such trying scenes, as he had been conversant with.—Every other verse, in the original, begins with a letter of the Hebrew alphabet, nearly in regular order: and this arrangement, which, with some variations, is frequently adopted, might be intended as a help to those, who desired to commit to memory these sacred poems, for their comfort and benefit in silence and solitude.—The Mosaic dispensation engaged peculiar temporal blessings to the nation of Israel, whilst they were obedient: yet individuals frequently prospered in wickedness, whilst the righteous were afflicted and persecuted. (Notes, Ps. lxxiii. 1-17.) This seemed to imply an inconsistency betwixt the word and the providence of God, and formed a great trial to ancient believers. To this difficulty the psalmist here gives a copious solution, with many excellent cautions and counsels, which, at the same time are equally suited, by varying a few expressions, to the case of Christians in this evil world. (Notes, lxxiii. 18-22. Prov. xxiii. 17, 18. xxiv. 19, 20. Marg. Ref.)

V. 3. This verse may be rendered: "Trust in the LORD, and do good; dwell in the land; and feed thou verily." All the verbs are imperative.—The union between entire dependence on God, and doing good, as the way to be comfortable and happy, is peculiarly to be noticed. The land of Canaan was considered as the sum of earthly, and the type of heavenly felicity: to dwell and be provided for, in the Lord's land, under his protection, near his ordinances, and among his people, was all that the genuine Israelite could desire. But the words may be considered as an exhortation to the people to dwell in the land, and not to remove on every difficulty, among the surrounding Gentiles: with a promise that verily God would feed them there. (Notes, Ruth i. 1—10.)

V. 4. To "delight," not in earthly possessions, pleasures, and distinctions, but in God, in knowing, loving, and worshipping him, and enjoying his love; and to delight in contemplation, devotion, and admiring praise, is to be spiritually-minded, like the inhabitants of heaven, and qualified for their felicity.—He that seeks delight in worldly objects very seldom obtains the wishes of his heart: but all the spiritual desires and requests of those who delight in God will be granted, nay, far exceeded. (Marg. Ref. Notes, Is. lviii. 13, 14. Hab. iii. 17—19. Rom. v. 11. vii. 5—9. Phil. iv. 4. Col. iii. 1—4. 1 Pet. i. 8, 9.)

V. 5—8. "When thou hast any difficult business in hand, or when thou knowest not what course to take, for accomplishing thy honest designs: leave all to the Lord, and trust to him, in pious and upright causes, that he will direct and assist thee, and bring things to a good issue." (Bp. Patrick.) (Notes, Prov. iii. 5, 6. Phil. iv. 6, 7.) The original is 'Roll thy way,' &c. (Notes, Prov. xvi. 3. Marg. 1 Pet. v. 5—7.) The Septuagint render it "Reveal thy way," &c.; which is very expressive of the relief which the believer, when burdened with trouble and anxiety, obtains by opening his case, and pouring out his soul before God in fervent prayers. (Notes, 1 Sam. i. 9—16.) This may especially be hoped for under unmerited calamities, which for a while darken the reputation, as mists and clouds obscure the sun: but God will in due time clear up the character of the upright, and make it as bright as the noonday. (Notes, Is. liv. 17. Mic. vii. 8—10. Rom. viii. 32—34.) Silent waiting on God, in patience and confidence, is therefore recommended; without giving way to that uneasiness and agitation, which are generally felt, when the ungodly for a while prosper, and run down the conscientious: or to eagerness in self-vindication: and especially a caution is given against anger and bitterness, and an imitation of the vile tempers and unjust measures of those who are the objects of indignation and of envy. (Notes, 11. v. 9. Marg. Ref.)

V. 9. (Note, xxxvi. 12.) The earth. Or "the land." He has all that the earth itself can supply, who has food and raiment, and things suited to his station, with peace, contentment, and a thankful heart. (Notes, 10, 11, 21, 22. Matt. v. 5.)

V. 10, 11. "The whole duration of the world itself is but "a little while," in the sight of him whose hope is full of immortality. But the calamities and deaths of princes, the tragical fate of empires "swept with the besom of destruction;" the overthrow of cities, whose place is nowhere to be found, by the most curious and diligent enquirer; and the desolations of the chosen city Jerusalem,—are sufficient to draw forth the tear of commiseration, and to extinguish the kindling spark of envy, in every considerate mind.—The meek bear their own adversities, and the prosperity of their enemies, without envy, anger, or complaint. They, and they only, possess the earth, as they go towards the kingdom of heaven, by being humble and cheerful, and content with what their good God has allotted them.—They have no turbulent repining thoughts that they deserve better; but they possess such a quietness, as makes their very dreams pleasing." (Horne, and Walton in Horne.) (Notes, clix. 4. P. O. Is. xxix. 17—19. lvi. 15, 16.)—The meek, here spoken of, are not 17 For the arms of the wicked shall be broken: but the LORD upholdeth the righteous.

18 The LORD knoweth the days of the upright; and their inheritance shall be for ever.

19 They shall not be ashamed in the evil time: and in the days of famine they shall be satisfied.

20 But the wicked shall perish, and the enemies of the LORD shall be as the fat of lambs: they shall consume; into smoke shall they consume away.

21 The wicked borroweth, and payeth not again: but the righteous sheweth mercy, and giveth.

22 For such as be blessed of him shall inherit the earth; and they that be cursed of him shall be cut off.

23 The steps of a good man are ordered by the LORD: and he delighteth in his way.

24 Though he fall, he shall not be utterly cast down: for the LORD upholdeth him with his hand.

25 I have been young, and now am old; yet have I not seen the righteous forsaken, nor his seed begging bread.

26 He is ever merciful, and lendeth; and his seed is blessed.

27 Depart from evil, and do good; and dwell for evermore.

28 For the LORD loveth judgment, and forsaketh not his saints; they are preserved for ever: but the seed of the wicked shall be cut off.

those of naturally easy, quiet, and indolent tempers; but such as are rendered humble, teachable, submissive, and gentle, by the special grace of God: and the abundant inward peace which he bestows, and which passes all understanding, fills their souls with vast delight. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 12—15. The holiness and happiness of the righteous, and the special favour which God shews them, excite the enmity and envy of the wicked. Thus Cain hated, and envied, and murdered Abel, (Notes, Gen. iv. 1—12;) thus Saul, from a similar spirit, plotted against David, and gnashed on him with his teeth; and thus the Jewish rulers persecuted the holy Jesus and his disciples. (Notes, xxxv. 15, 16.) For a while they seem to prosper; but the Lord despises their impotent malice, and foresees the day, when they will suffer the just punishment of their crimes; and when all their policy and violence will only serve to enhance their own misery. (Notes, ii. 1—6. vii. 12—16.) This is the certain doom of all impenitent persecutors, in proportion to their deliberate enmity to the cause of God, and his image in his humble, afflicted, and upright servants.

V. 16, 17. The little, which is allotted to the righteous, comes from special covenanted love, and is secured by faithful promises; it is given in answer to their prayers, and in the use of lawful means; it is received with thankfulness, and used with temperance and charity; and being attended with a blessing, it subserves the salvation of their souls: and in all these, and many other respects, it is far more comfortable and profitable, than the ill-gotten or abused riches of ungodly men; (Notes, Prov. xxx. 7—9. Matt. vi. 11. 1 Tim. vi. 6—10.) for their prosperity and power will soon become useless as a broken bow; while God himself protects and supports the righteous.—The great question then is, whether He be with us, or against us; and the great misfortune is, that this question is so seldom asked. (Horne.)

V. 18, 19. God knoweth what things his children need, what dangers and enemies await them, and what sorrows they endure; he is omnipotent and all-sufficient; and it is "his good pleasure to give them the kingdom," the eternal inheritance; so that he will never leave them to want any thing really good for them by the way, however distressing the times may be in which they live; or to be ashamed of their confidence in him. (Notes, i. 4—6. Matt. vi. 25—32. Luke xii. 22—34.)

V. 20. Fat of lambs, &c. As the fat of the sacrifices was consumed on the altar by the fire, (which was a type of God's righteous vengeance upon sinners,) till it vanished into smoke; so the wicked will be the sacrifices to God's justice, and be destroyed by the fire of his indignation. (Note, Gen. iv. 3—5.)

V. 21, 22. The wicked, though for a while prosperous, would soon be reduced, by the secret curse of God on his affairs, to borrow; and be disabled from paying, as well as careless about it: but the righteous would be rendered able to gratify his inclination in acts of liberal mercy, through the Divine blessing, and the promise which secured to him the inheritance of the land.—This more especially referred to the Israelites in Canaan; yet the same blessing and curse, even in temporal things, are still often experienced and observed. (Notes, Deut. xxviii. 3—14. 43, 44. Prov. xxii. 7.)

30<sup>a</sup> The mouth of the righteous speaketh wisdom, and his tongue talketh of judgment.

31<sup>t</sup> The law of his God is in his heart; *none of his *steps shall slide.

32 The wicked *watcheth the righteous, and seeketh to slay him.

33 The LORD *will not leave him in his hand, *nor condemn him when he is judged.

34<sup>v</sup> Wait on the LORD, and *keep his way, and he shall *exalt thee to inherit the land : *when the wicked are cut off, thou shalt see it.

V. 23, 24. Our translators here insert the word good ; and no doubt the pious man, the true believer, is exclusively meant.—God directs, counsels, and supports his steps ; and he delights in his holy conversation, and the fruits of his own Spirit, which are through Christ well-pleasing to him. (Notes, cxlvii. 10, 11. 1 Sam. ii. 9. Jer. ix. 23, 24. Zeph. iii. 14-20. Phil. iv. 14-20. Heb. xiii. 15, 16.)—A good man may fall through temptation, as David had done in a most deplorable manner ; but he shall not be cast down to rise no more, as hypocrites are, or be a castaway, one finally rejected by God ; because God himself upholds him by his mighty power. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 25, 26. There is not an absolute promise in Scripture that no righteous man shall ever want bread, or his seed become beggars ; but the psalmist had never, during a long course of observation, known an instance of the kind. It is, indeed, a very rare case in any age, but was peculiarly so under the Mosaic dispensation.—Yet times of persecution seem excepted from general rules concerning temporal things, having so many particular promises relating to them ; and we cannot tell how it may please our wise and righteous God, for our good, to try our faith and patience, or to remove us out of this world, or how he may see good to dispose of our posterity. But, in general, the godly man will best secure himself and his children from want ; and that genuine liberality to the poor, in giving or lending, according as circumstances may require, which men think will impoverish their families, is, in fact, the best way of laying up a provision for them. (Notes, cxii. 5-10. Prov. xi. 24-26. xiii. 22, 23. xix. 17. Ec. xi. 1-6.)

V. 27, 28. This general counsel for present and future happiness is here again inculcated, (Note, xxvii. 11-14.) in a manner which shews that none but the saints, the regenerate and believing, who have obtained mercy, do thus “depart from evil, and do good ;” and the final perseverance of the saints is most expressly maintained, and grounded on the Lord’s love of judgment, and faithfulness to his promises.—Some think this doctrine is to be found nowhere, except in St. Paul’s epistles, and then they endeavour to explain away his language ; but not one sentence in his writings is more explicit than this declaration of the inspired psalmist. (Note, 1 Pet. i. 3-5.)

V. 29-31. (Notes, 9-11.)—The righteous man, “whose mouth speaketh wisdom, whose tongue talketh of judgment, and in whose heart is the law of his God, shall not slide in any of his steps.” Thus some render these verses, which strongly mark the character of those saints, “who are preserved for ever.” (Notes, xl. 6-8. Jer. xxxi. 33, 34. Rom. vii. 22-25.)—Wise and pious conversation, when it comes from the abundance of the heart, and is enforced by a holy example, is one grand means of communicating the savour of divine truth around in families and neighbourhoods and of transmitting it to posterity. (Notes, lxxi. 13-15. 22-24. Prov. x. 20, 21. xv. 7. xxv. 11-13. Matt. xii. 33-37. Jam. iii. 3-12. P. O. 1-12.)

V. 32, 33. In general, God will defend his servants against the designs of wicked men, when, under colour of law, they seek to murder them by a judicial process, and in those cases in which he, for wise reasons, allows persecutors to prosper, he will finally rescue the persecuted from their malice, and openly reverse their unrighteous decisions.—The wicked one, “the accuser of the brethren,” will, in like manner, be baffled and silenced. (Notes, 5-8. 12-15. Rom. viii. 33-39.)

V. 34. ‘The apostle, writing to the Hebrew converts, under affliction and persecution, thus expresseth the sentiment contained in this verse ; “Cast not away your confidence, which hath great recompense of reward : for ye have need of patience, that, after ye have done the will of God, ye might receive the promise. For yet a little while, and he that shall come, will come, and will not tarry.”’ Horne. (Notes, Job xvii. 8, 9. xxiii. 8-12. Prov. iv. 23-27.)

V. 35, 36. Our translation gives, as the emblem of a wicked man’s prosperity, an evergreen, flourishing and beautiful to look upon, but bearing no fruit, or only such as is poisonous. But most expositors suppose that a tree, growing in its native soil, and never transplanted, is meant ; and, in these circumstances, trees acquire their largest and most luxuriant growth. (Marg.)—Thus Saul, Doeg, and Ahithophel, in David’s time, had flourished ; and thus they had vanished.—The vision of Nebuchadnezzar, and Daniel’s interpretation, form a striking illustration of these verses. (Notes, Dan. iv. 1-33.) ‘I looked to see what was become of him, and whether he was not removed (as a tree sometimes is) to another place, but there was no such man to be found.’ (Bp. Patrick.) (Notes, Job v. 3-5. xviii. 5-21.)

V. 37, 38. He that patiently and accurately observes the dealings of God with his upright, consistent, and faithful servants, will find, that, whatever trials and disquietudes they have during a great part of their lives, their closing scene is tranquil and comfortable, and that there are very few exceptions to this general rule. But a contrary and dreadful end, sooner or later, awaits all the ungodly. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 39, 40. (Marg. Ref. Eph. ii. 8-10. 2 Tim. ii. 16-18. Tit. ii. 11-14.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

It is of vast importance to understand the present and future condition of the righteous and the wicked, that we may know what to choose and to expect. The workers of iniquity, who cast off the fear of God to follow their own corrupt inclinations, and who are fraudulent, covetous, sensual, or profane ; who “plot against the righteous, gnashing upon them with their teeth,” and using their power and subtlety to oppress, ruin, and murder the poor ; even such monsters of wickedness often prosper for a time, succeed in their projects, flourish in wealth, pomp, and mirth, and seem to enjoy happiness. (Note, Job xxi. 7-16.) But their flourishing resembles that of the grass, and they will be soon cut down, and wither ; shortly they will be no more found on earth ; into heaven they cannot enter ; hell alone remains for them, where they will for ever be sacrifices to the righteous vengeance of their offended God. Then their power of doing mischief will be at an end, and their injurious swords will pierce their own souls with inexpressible anguish. As they are now under the wrath and curse of the Almighty, their plenty and prosperity only pamper them for destruction ; and the wealth which they leave behind them proves a snare, and often a curse, to their posterity ; whilst terrors of conscience, dread of death, and furious passions, mar their precarious enjoyments, and give them a sad foretaste of the wrath to come. Who, that believes these things, can envy them, or fret themselves at beholding their success and magnificence ; whilst, like the heathen sacrifices, they are led to the slaughter, adorned with gaudy ribands, and accompanied with the viol, the song, and the dance.—But the righteous bear another character, meet with other treatment, have other supports, and will experience a contrary end. They “trust in the LORD,” walk in his ordinances and commandments, and imitate him who went about doing good to the bodies and souls of men. They delight in the favour and service of God, and expect their happiness from him ; the leading desires of their hearts are after communion with him, and conformity to him, and to be instrumental to his glory ; they follow after meekness, humility, and a blameless conversation ; they are upright and sincere, and though often poor and needy, they spare from other expenses a portion to lend and give, as occasion requires. Their mouth will be speaking of wisdom, and their tongue will be talking of judgment ; and this springs from the abundance of the heart, in which the law of God is written, and comports with the actions of their lives, which are ordered in his ways. Their salvation is from the Lord, and reigns within ; and it appears that they are accepted through the merits, because they are partakers of the Spirit of Christ, and bring forth the fruits of the Spirit.—Yet must such Christians expect tribulation in the world. They are not exempted from the common afflictions of life, or pampered with worldly prosperity ; their heavenly Father does not withhold from them salutary correction ; the world hates and despises them ; calumnies, reproaches, and persecutions are their usual portion ; whilst some have been constrained to wander in dens and caves, others (“of whom the world was not worthy,”) have been immured in prisons, and tortured to death. In general they are a poor and afflicted people, and Satan distresses, as much as he can, those whom he is not able to deceive, defile, or destroy ; their endeavours to do good are often unsuccessful, and ingratitude proves their only recompense. They therefore have need of faith and patience, of hope and love ; but, observing the directions, and pleading the promises of God, they find inward comfort to counterbalance their outward trials. He will maintain their lot, and supply their wants ; whatever they lose for conscience’ sake, “verily they shall be fed ;” and food and raiment here, with heaven at last, is a goodly portion.—The Lord will also vindicate their characters, and give them peace of conscience ; when he sees good, their enemies shall be at peace with them ; and they shall enjoy more content than if they actually inherited the earth, and delight themselves in the abundance of peace ; for their little shall be better than the riches of many wicked. The Lord himself will uphold and protect them ; he knows their days, and will proportion their strength and comfort, and in no evil time shall they be ashamed of their confidence ; for “they are the blessed of the LORD, and their children with them.” He ordereth their steps, and delighteth in their way ; if they fall under temptation, they shall not be utterly cast down ; if into trouble, he will not leave them to sink under it. Their work of faith, and labour and liberality of love, instead of impoverishing them, shall lay up an inheritance for their children ; and few accurate observers of mankind have known the consistent believer, or his children, reduced to abject friendless penury. In short, the Lord, having separated his people from the world, and taught them to love righteousness and

PSALM XXXVIII.

The psalmist deprecates the wrath of God, and describes the sufferings to which his sins had exposed him, 1-10. He complains that his friends deserted him, while persecuted by his foes, 11, 12. He resigns to God, and hopes in him; while he confesses his sins, shews the character of his enemies, and pleads for deliverance, 13-22.

A Psalm of David, *to bring to remembrance.

O LORD, rebuke me not in thy wrath; neither chasten me in thy hot displeasure.

2 For <sup>a</sup>thine arrows stick fast in me, and <sup>a</sup>thy hand presseth me sore.

4 For <sup>a</sup>mine iniquities are gone over mine head: <sup>a</sup>as an heavy burden they are too heavy for me.

5 <sup>a</sup>My wounds stink and are corrupt because of my foolishness.

6 I am <sup>a</sup>troubled; <sup>a</sup>I am bowed down greatly; <sup>a</sup>I go mourning all the day long.

7 For <sup>a</sup>my loins are filled with a loathsome disease: and there is no soundness in my flesh.

8 I am feeble and sore broken: <sup>a</sup>I have roared by reason of the disquietness of my heart.

9 LORD, all my desire is before thee; and <sup>a</sup>my groaning is not hid from thee.

10 <sup>a</sup>My heart panteth, my strength faileth me: as for <sup>a</sup>the light of mine eyes, it also is <sup>a</sup>gone from me.

judgment, will preserve them for ever; and, however they may be slandered, tempted, or persecuted, by the way, their end shall be serene and happy: they shall have hope in their death, and be better spoken of afterwards, than during their lives; and, whilst they enjoy their everlasting inheritance, they will witness the destruction of all impenitent transgressors. Even in this world, it is evident that the afflicted righteous man is far happier than the most prosperous of the wicked.—Let sinners, then, be counselled to “depart from evil, and to do good;” to repent and forsake sin, to trust in the mercy of God through Jesus Christ, and take his yoke upon them, and learn of him, that they may dwell for evermore in heaven. Let us all watch against impatience, envy, and despondency, and look more to the wretched end, than to the present state, of wicked men; committing all we are, and have, and do, to the Lord’s disposal, and he will order that which is best for us. Let us cease from wrath and contention, which are sure inlets to evil-doing, and wait for and on the Lord, and keep his way, without wearying or turning aside. Let us endeavour to give energy to edifying conversation, by holy living; let us mark the closing scenes of different characters; and thus keeping our eyes fixed on eternal things, and our dependence on God’s mercy, we may pass safely and comfortably through this dangerous and miserable life, meet death with composure, and have “an entrance ministered to us abundantly into the everlasting kingdom of our Lord and Saviour, Jesus Christ.”

NOTES.

PSALM XXXVIII. Title. Either the psalmist, under his affliction, composed this psalm to assist him in recollecting his sins, or in calling upon God to remember his distress: or he desired to remember as long as he lived, and wished to remind others, how he had suffered for his sins, and what his sentiments and sensations had been whilst enduring correction.—It is the third of those which are called penitential psalms; and describes among the psalmist’s other trials some grievous diseases, with which he was visited for his sins; or, as some think, his inward trials were represented, by language taken from enfeebling and loathsome sickness. It is probable, that the calamities which befell David, after his sin in respect of Bathsheba and Uriah, gave occasion to the doleful complaints contained in it. (Notes, vi. xxxii.)

V. 1, 2. (Note, vi. 1.)—Arrows. (2.) Acute pains, anguish of spirit, and sharp sufferings of any kind, are spoken of under the figure of barbed arrows, which fasten and rankle in the flesh, and cannot be extracted without the most exquisite torture. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 3. Soundness. Some understand this clause to mean, that disease had so altered the psalmist, as scarcely to have left him the form or appearance of a human being. (Notes, xxx. 2. xli. 4-8. Job ii. 7, 8. xix. 5-22. xxx. 15-19. Is. i. 5, 6.) Whatever allusion may, in this passage, be made, either to the depravity of human nature, the prevalence of sin, or the anguish of the soul under a sense of Divine wrath; it seems evident, that the writer was visited with some dire malady, which affected his whole frame in the most distressing manner; and that he considered this, as the chastisement of God, for some special sins, of which his conscience accused him.

V. 4. David’s iniquities, like the numberless drops which form a deluge, had been so multiplied, that they overwhelmed him; as waters which rise above a man’s head, so that he can no longer stand against, or escape, them. And as he felt, that the temporal consequences of his crimes were so distressing, and oppressed him beyond endurance; so he seems to have been convinced, that the burden or guilt of them was far too heavy for him to endure, without finally sinking under it.—What then was that load of guilt and punishment, which Christ sustained, when “the LORD caused to meet on him the iniquities of us all;” and when “He bare our sins, in his own body, on the tree!” Yet he, as Emmanuel, was able to endure the burden, and to remove it for ever from his people! (Notes, xl. 11, 12. Is. liii. 4-12. 1 Pet. ii. 18-25.)

V. 5. Some accommodate this verse to the case of those who, having been wounded in their conflict with sin and Satan, foolishly delay submission, repentance, and application to the atoning blood of Christ, through pride and unbelief; while their souls in the mean time are growing more and more diseased and wretched, and their case more and more deplorable and disgraceful. (Notes, xxxii. 3-5. Jer. viii. 21, 22.)

V. 6-10. (Notes, 3, 5. vi. 6, 7. xxii. 1, 2. xxxi. 10-13. lxxxviii. 1-9. cii. 3-11. cvii. 17-20. Is. ix. 9-15. Matt. xxvi. 36-39.)—“But why do I make such a particular enumeration of my sufferings? Thou, Lord, understandest what I want, and what I would have. Though I should say never a word, all my miseries, and all the sighs they cost me, are not unknown to thee. Thou knowest the agitation of my spirit, which wanders up and down in restless thought, but all to no purpose; for my strength has forsaken me: the light of my eyes is so weak, that I can scarce make any use of them.” (Bp. Patrick.) (Notes, Ps. lxxix. 1-3. cxix. 81, 82. Is. xxxviii. 14, 15.)

V. 11, 12. Cowardice, pride, and selfishness caused David’s friends and acquaintance to keep at a distance, during his afflictions; lest they should share his disgrace and danger, or be put to expense or inconvenience: but his enemies were emboldened in forming plans to accomplish his destruction.—These particulars were still more emphatically verified, in the sufferings of the Son of David. (Notes, xxxi. 10-13. xli. 9. lxxix. 8, 9. lxxxviii. 6-9. Job vi. 16-23. Luke x. 30-37. John xvi. 31-33. Marg. Ref.)

V. 13, 14. David, in the patience and meekness with which he endured his complicated sufferings, was a type of him, “who, when he was reviled, reviled not again:” but David’s troubles were the chastisement, and part of them seem to have been the consequences, of his transgressions; whereas Christ suffered for our sins, and ours alone. (Notes, Is. liii. 4-7. Matt. xxvii. 11-18. 1 Pet. ii. 18-25.)

V. 15. The translation of one clause in this verse, in the common prayer-book, contains an important instruction, “Thou shalt answer for me, O LORD, my God.” (Marg.) Thus Christ was silent before his false accusers and unjust judges, and “committed himself to Him that judgeth righteously.”

V. 16-18. It was evident, that the enemies of David were ungodly men, who would rejoice in his falls and calamities, from dislike, not to his sins, but to his religion: the honour of God was therefore concerned, to confound and silence them; and consequently to uphold his servant, notwithstanding that he was conscious of his weakness and unworthiness. (Notes, xlii. 1-4. xxxv. 15, 16. Jer. xx. 10-13.) This consciousness, and fear of the Lord, presented a most gloomy prospect before his eyes: except as he trusted in God to keep him from falling, for the honour of his own name! and as he ingenuously confessed his past sins, and was grieved and distressed on account of them. (Notes, xxxii. 3-5. li. 3-5. 2 Cor. vii. 9-11.)—Sorrow is, &c. (17.) (Notes, lxxxvii. 2-12. Is. liii. 2, 3.)

V. 19, 20. The humble spirit of a penitent pleading guilty before God; and the consciousness, at the same time, of being wrongfully hated, and ungratefully and basely used, by men; not for the sins into which he had fallen in particular instances, but for the general tenour of a holy and useful life, are strongly marked in this passage; which shews, that the most decided rejoicing in the testimony of a man’s conscience, respecting his conduct towards men, in those things of which he has been unjustly condemned, is perfectly consistent

Under the temporal effects of the Lord's abhorrence of sin, and the anguish of his correcting rod, the believer is most troubled with the apprehension of his vindictive wrath, and lest he should share the doom of the ungodly; and he can bear any thing when assured that this shall never be his case. Yet God often sees good, in order to warn others, to silence the reproaches of scoffers, to vindicate the honour of religion, and for his own glory, to make the afflictions of his offending children very sharp, complicated, and permanent; and to extort from them many doleful groans and lamentations. In such circumstances, when the correction begins to produce its salutary effects; they readily trace their sorrows to the fatherly displeasure of the Lord, whose "arrows stick fast in them, and whose hand presseth them sore;" and they humbly acknowledge their sins to be the cause of his anger. Their own iniquities form that deluge which goeth over their heads; and their sense of guilt is the heaviest burden which is laid upon them: "it is indeed too heavy for them to bear;" and would sink them into despair and ruin, unless removed by the pardoning mercy of God. The prevalence of sin, and the successful force of temptations, form their worst diseases, and most offensive and dangerous wounds: and, whilst "there is no soundness in their flesh," and no rest in their bones, they are led to consider their souls, in which 'there is no health.' For pride, covetousness, envy, malice, and lust, are diseases of the soul, of far greater malignity than fevers, dropsies, palsies, gout, or stone, are of the body: yet numbers feel not their sickness, till it be too late to apply the remedy. But, when we perceive our true condition, the good Physician is valued, resorted to, and obeyed; (Note, Matt. ix. 10-13:) though even they, who are in this sure way of an effectual cure, often retard it, and experience grievous relapses, through their foolishness; and their wounds rankle and corrupt, because they delay to go to their merciful friend, and to apply the healing balm which he hath prepared. Would we not prolong our own miseries, when we are conscious of having offended, we should immediately approach the mercy-seat with penitent confessions and believing prayers; that without delay our sins may be pardoned, our strength renewed, and our enemy prevented from rejoicing over us. Yet, the feeling and effects of the Divine displeasure, must needs trouble him who loves God, and "bow him down greatly, and cause him to go mourning all the day long;" and even enfeeble him, and cause him to "roar for the very disquietness of his heart;" for "a wounded spirit, who can bear?" (Note, Prov. xviii. 14.) and this uneasiness will be in proportion to the degree in which he values the favour of God, and delights in communion with him. But, while the hypocrite takes encouragement from David's sins to transgress, he is a perfect stranger to David's ingenuous anguish of spirit under the consciousness of his guilt.—In the true believer's case, however, all this trouble will be useful: he will wait for and on his God, and not seek relief from the world, or from himself: he will bring his whole desire before his heavenly Father, and be encouraged, because "his groaning is not hid from him;" even, though like one expiring "his heart panteth, his strength faileth, and the sight of his eyes is gone from him," and he knows not what to say or do. Nay, should all this be attended with the unkindness and inconstancy of lovers, friends, and relatives, who stand aloof from his affliction; whilst treacherous and cruel foes are "laying snares for his life, and seeking his hurt, and speaking mischievous things, and imagining deceits all the day long;" that consciousness of guilt which forms his heaviest load, will keep down indignation, silence murmurs and reproaches, and produce meek and quiet submission. For, if the holy Jesus bore all this, without a complaint or a reproof, what reason can an humble sinner think he has, to yield to impatience or anger, when mercifully corrected for his sins, whatever rod the Lord is pleased to employ? He will therefore be as one deaf and dumb, respecting the calumnies and scoffs of the wicked, when he feels himself to be under the Divine rebuke for his sins, (Note, Ez. xvi. 60-63;) he will "commit himself unto him that judgeth righteously;" and be thankful that he may yet hope and pray to him with the prospect of being heard and helped.—When the wicked are ready to rejoice at our calamities, or to magnify themselves against us; when our feet slip; when we feel ourselves feeble, and ready to halt or stumble, and are grieved continually, that we have given, or lest we should give, them cause to triumph over us; we have good arguments to urge in prayer, why the Lord should help and uphold us. Let us then declare before him our iniquity, and be sorry for our sins; and seek earnestly the destruction of our inward foes, which are so lively and so strong. And if, notwithstanding our offences against God, our enemies hate us, not for our sins, but because we follow the thing that is good; let us not be discouraged by their wrongful and ungrateful enmity; seeing we are in this conformed to our Saviour: but, after his example, let us still persevere in endeavouring to "overcome evil with good." (Note, Rom. xii. 17-21.) Let us also continue in prayer, that the Lord may pardon and subdue our iniquities; then will he never forsake us, or be far from us; for he will surely hasten to the help of all those, who trust in him as their salvation.

NOTES.

PSALM XXXIX. V. 14. It is thought that David wrote this psalm during Absalom's rebellion; and it is evident that the writer's mind was greatly discomposed, by injuries and temptations, when he began his meditation. He, however, resolved to practise the rules which he gave to others, (Notes, xxxvii. 1-9;) and not only to walk with peculiar circumspection, but especially to watch over his words, and stop his mouth, as the mouths of animals are confined by a muzzle; for so the word signifies. (Marg.) Aware of the baseness of his enemies, he determined on a total silence before them: he would neither speak anything in his own vindication, or complain of them; nor utter any pious discourse, which would have been like throwing pearls before swine. Yet, the treatment which he received, his indignation at the crimes which he witnessed, his zeal for the honour of God, and the restraint imposed on him, excited in his mind a vehement and painful commotion; and the thoughts which wrought within, proved, like the blowing of embers, which produces an intense heat, and bursts forth into a flame. (Jer. xx. 7-2. Ez. iii. 22-27.) He did not indeed break his resolution by speaking before the wicked: but, with vehemency, and some tincture of impatience, he prayed to the Lord, that he might know his end, and the measure and limits of his days, and how near he was to the closing scene, that, being suitably affected with the shortness of life, and his own frailty, he might be the more engaged to prepare for death and eternity, and less concerned about his temporal interests. (Notes, xc. 7-12. 1 Cor. vii. 29-31. Jam. iv. 13-17. v. 7-11. 1 Pet. iv. 7.) David, in his entire silence, was a type of Christ, when he answered nothing before Caiaphas, Herod, and Pilate. (Notes, Matt. xxvi. 63-68. xxvii. 11-18. Luke xxiii. 6-12. John xix. 8-12.)

V. 5. At his best state, Selah; Or, "when settled or established most firmly."—Some things decay after a certain time, but generally last that time; others endure long, barring accidents, yet are easily broken: but the life of man not only wears out speedily as a garment, but it is also brittle like glass. (Notes, xc. 3-6. ciii. 15-18. Job xiv. 1-6. Ec. i. 2.)

V. 6. A vain shew. Or, shadow, unsubstantial, and vanishing; or image, (Marg. Notes, lxxiii. 18-22.) Such are all the interests, pursuits, and distinctions of this world; about which men are constantly disquieting themselves and others, till death stops their career, and they leave their acquisitions without knowing who will at length possess them, and remove to a state of important and eternal realities. (Notes, xlix. 6-20. Esth. v. 11-14. viii. 1, 2. Prov. xiii. 22. Luke xii. 15-20. xvi. 27-31.)

V. 7, 8. Meditation, on the vanity of all outward things, led the psalmist to fix more entirely his expectation on God alone, as the fountain of happiness: but recollecting his heinous transgressions, and his proneness to sin, he earnestly prayed for deliverance from guilt and depravity; and that he might not, by subsequent misconduct, disgrace the cause of God, and expose himself to the reproach of any foolish and wicked man. The original is Nabal. (Notes, 1 Sam. xxv. 10-17. 23-31. Marg. Ref.)

V. 9, 10. "I was dumb, I will not open my mouth," &c. The consideration, that his afflictions were appointed by his heavenly Father, silenced the psalmist's complaints; (Notes, xxxviii. 13, 14. Lev. x. 3. 1 Sam. iii. 16-18. 2 Kings xx. 19. Job i. 20-22;) and yet pleaded for a mitigation of them, because he was ready to sink under them. Thus Christ, when entering on the last scene of his unknown sufferings, prayed, "Father, if it be possible, let this cup pass stranger with thee, and a sojourner, <sup>d</sup>as all my fathers were.

13 O <sup>e</sup>spare me, that I may recover strength, before I go hence, and <sup>f</sup>be no more.

PSALM XL.

David praises God for deliverance out of deep distress, and shews the benefit which would thence be derived to numbers; and the happiness of such as trust in God. 1-3. As a type of Christ, (or, Christ speaking by him,) he states the inefficiency of legal sacrifices, and the efficacy of the Redeemer's obedience, 4-8. He declares that he had published God's righteousness and salvation; and pleads for deliverance from urgent troubles, and the confusion of his enemies, with the triumphing of the righteous. 9-17.

V. 11. 'The word, (rendered beauty), 'signifieth all that man desireth, as health, force, strength, beauty, and in whatsoever he hath delight: so that the rod of God taketh away all that is desired in this world.' (Notes. xxxviii. 3-10. cii. 3-11. Job ii. 7, 8. xlii. 24-28.)

A moth, &c. 'The body is as a garment to the soul, in which sin hath lodged a moth, which by degrees fretteth away, first the beauty, then the strength, and finally the contexture of the parts.' (Horne.)—Thus the greatest, as well as the meanest, of men, is but mere vanity. (Notes. 5, 6. Ec. xii. 8-14.)

V. 12. The patriarchs lived in Canaan, as in a foreign country, by the allowance of the possessors, moving their tents from place to place; and they confessed themselves to be strangers and pilgrims in the land: but David ruled, as a powerful monarch and a renowned conqueror, over the people of Israel, now fully settled in their promised inheritance. When, however, he considered the shortness and vanity of life, and looked forward to a future and permanent state; he too owned, that he was a stranger and pilgrim on earth, even as they also had been. (Notes. cxix. 19-21. Gen. xlviii. 9. Heb. xi. 8-16. 1 Pet. i. 1, 2. ii. 11.)

V. 13. If this psalm was composed during Absalom's usurpation, David might mean, that he was desirous, before he left the world, to recover his peace of mind, to be reinstated in his authority, and to retrieve his character. He, however, prayed that his faith, hope, and love might recover strength; that he might be enabled to do some further service to his people, before his death; and have inward comfort, when about to depart hence, and be no more seen. His prayer in all these respects was completely answered. (Notes, 1 Chr. xxix.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The presence of the wicked, especially if powerful and prosperous, exposes us to many temptations, either by enticing or terrifying us into improper compliances, or by exciting our indignation, or envy. When we are not able wholly to separate from them, we should double our watchfulness, and especially impose a strict restraint upon our tongues; lest we should be betrayed into boasting, reviling, slandering, flattering, or trifling conversation: remembering that they will criticize every expression, and turn it, if they can, to our disadvantage and the discredit of religion. Sometimes it may be necessary to keep silence even from good words, when they are likely to excite profane contempt or rage: yet in general we run into an extreme, when we are backward to engage in edifying discourse. But even if we be enabled to bridle our tongues, we shall often find ourselves incapable of repressing our passions. When zeal, anger, impatience, compassion, grief, and other conflicting affections, are excited in the heart, confinement increases their force, and reflection excites more disquietude, till a fire seems to be kindled within, which must in some way break forth. In this case, it is our wisdom to retire, and pour out our hearts before God, and to utter our complaints, sorrows, and desires to him alone. It is also very composing to the believer's mind, under sore trials and temptations, to know and consider his end, and the measure of his days: but we are never suitably affected with such subjects, except we pray over them, and are inwardly taught by the Spirit of God. It would be in vain for us to enquire the precise time which we have to live, nor would the information, could it be had, be desirable; (Note, 2 Kings xx. 6;) it will answer every good purpose attentively to consider the shortness and uncertainty of life. Our days are but an handbreadth, or as nothing, before God, and in comparison of his eternity: and in our greatest prosperity, and in the vigour of youth and health, verily every man is altogether vanity. He cannot live long; he may die soon, and suddenly; his busy cares are useless, his acquisitions are a shadow; he is disquieted in vain; and if he succeed in heaping up riches, he must shortly leave them, not knowing who shall gather them. How absurd then are the perplexing anxieties, and the incessant fatigues, of the most successful worldling, who pursues such shadows, to the marring of his present comforts, and the ruin of his immortal soul! Indeed the believer's disquietude about the difficulties of his path, and the treatment he meets with, are not much more rational.—We are happy in exact proportion as we despair of happiness from this changing sinful world; and wait and hope for it, from the mercy and all-sufficient love of God our Saviour. Instead of being much concerned about temporal things: let us earnestly pray to be "delivered from all our transgressions;" and that we may not be made a reproach to those, who, being foolish at all times, never so much expose their folly, as when they deride the hopes, or insult over the falls, of the righteous. We should look above instruments, and view the hand of God in all our afflictions: and then faith in his wisdom, justice, truth and love, and consciousness that he rebukes us for our iniquity, will render us silent and submissive, because he hath done it. Then our prayers for the removal of his stroke, even when we "are consumed with the blow of his hand," will be offered with resignation to his will, and hope in his mercy.—But if his fatherly chastisements of his children for their offences consume their strength and comeliness, as a moth fretteth away a garment; what will be the effect of his avenging wrath against his enemies! And as every man is vanity, it behoves sinners to make haste to seek forgiveness, before they go hence and be no more seen.—The Christian's sorrows are all sanctified; the gracious Lord will wipe away his tears, and answer all his prayers: he cannot but feel his afflictions; yet, as a stranger and a pilgrim on earth, he hopes for a better and more enduring habitation in heaven, where his heart and his treasure are already. He expects weariness and ill-treatment by the way: but his stay here will not be long; and, walking with God by faith, he goes forward on his journey, undiverted from his course, and not much cast down, by the ill accommodation or difficulties with which he meets. He only desires to be spared, till his measure of service on earth be finished, and his title to heaven clear; and that he may depart in that vigorous exercise of faith and grace, which may be honourable to God, encouraging to his brethren, and comfortable to himself. Then going hence, and being no more on earth, he enters upon his perfect and eternal rest; and leaves his pious friends consoled with the joyful hope of a blessed reunion; and instructed by his words and actions, how to live, to suffer, and to die. (Notes, Prov. xiv. 32. 1 Thes. iv. 13-18.)

NOTES.

PSALM XL. V. 1-5. In this psalm, David seems to have intended to speak of his own case and experience; but the Holy Spirit led him to use language, which, in its full meaning, can be applied to none but the Lord Jesus himself. The whole, indeed, may be accommodated to him, yet some passages are more suited to the case of the type, than to that of the antitype.—These verses may be interpreted of the Redeemer's deep and dreadful sufferings, and the happy effects which followed his deliverance from them. Exposed to the cruelty and malice of men, the horrid assaults of Satan, and the wrath of the Father, when bearing our sins; he was as one sinking in a dark and noisome pit, where dreadful noises are heard, (Marg;) and he was ready to be covered and suffocated with the miry clay: but under all these sufferings, "in waiting he waited for the LORD;" (Marg;) and his earnest prayers were heard; at his resurrection he was brought forth from the grave, and the state of the dead: and in his exaltation he was placed as on an immovable rock; his goings were established, his remaining work became most delightful, and his full success was ensured. (Notes, Is. liii. 9-12. Acts ii. 22-32.) Thus "a new song" was put into his mouth, which he teaches his people: for no such redemption could before be celebrated; and multitudes, by faith beholding his sufferings and the glory which followed, have learned to fear the justice, and trust in the mercy of God, through him. Such persons are made happy; whilst they do not so regard the rich and great as to trust in them, or proud tyrants and persecutors so as to dread their rage; and while they renounce all connection with those, who turn aside to idolatrous and superstitious delusions, or the deceitful interests and pleasures of sin. Many wonderful works the Lord had done for sinful man and for Israel; but this would exceed them all: nor could the number or value of his thoughts and contrivances of love and mercy be ever numbered, or estimated. (Notes, Eph. ii. 4-10. iii. 9-11. 1 Pet. i. 10-12. Rev. v. 11-14.)—Yet the passage may also be explained of David; and answers to some parts of the believer's experience.—David had been in many troubles, and seemed ready to sink in them, as in an horrible pit; but faith, patience, and prayer supported him, and carried him through all. (Notes, cxvi. 3-5. cxxx. 1-6. cxli. Title. 7. 2 Sam. xxii. 5, 6, 17, 18. Jer. xxxviii. 1-13. Lam. iii. 52-66. Jon. ii.) in due time he was rescued, advanced, and established; his way was made plain and prosperous; a new song was put into his mouth; (Note, xxxiii. 2, 3;) his example became useful to many; and his life was spent in attempting to reckon up, and celebrate, the wonders and counsels of the love of God to him and to his people, yet he could not at all do justice to the delightful subject. (Notes, lxxi. 13-24. cxxxix. 17, 18. cxlv. 5-7.)—The third and fourth verses may be connected as follows: "Many shall see it, and fear, and shall trust in the LORD: Saying, Blessed is the man," &c. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 6-8. It is uncertain, whether David had in these verses any intention of declaring, that cheerful and prompt obedience to the precepts of the moral law, proceeding from faith and love, was more acceptable to God than any legal sacrifices; (Note, 1. 7-15. 1 Sam. xv. 22;) but it is evident that the Holy Spirit foretold the obedience of the promised Messiah. appointed by God himself, were of no intrinsic value: he neither delighted in them, or required them for their own sake, nor could they take away sin. (Notes, Gen. viii. 20—22. Heb. ix. 18—26. x. 1—4. 11—18.) But the incarnation and obedience of the Son of God, which they shadowed forth, were previously appointed for that purpose. His ears were opened, to receive and obey the command of the Father; or pierced as those of servants were, who chose to continue perpetually with their masters. (Note, Ex. xxi. 3—6.) When the legal sacrifices were declared inefficient, the Redeemer promptly answered, "Lo, I come," &c. According to the eternal purpose of JEHOVAH, and as it was written in the Scriptures from the beginning, or "the opening of the roll," concerning him, he was prepared to appear in human nature, to magnify the law of God by his perfect and divine obedience even unto the death of the cross: (Notes, Gen. iii. 14, 15. 21. iv. 3—5: yea, his cordial love to the holy commandment, and his zeal for the honour of the Divine government and perfections, and his compassion for the souls of men, were so powerful, that he delighted in thus performing the will of his heavenly Father. (Notes, John iv. 31—38. Heb. x. 5—10.)—In quoting this passage, the apostle follows the translation of the Septuagint, which gives an interpretation, rather than a translation, of the words rendered, "Mine ears hast thou opened." But, as this variation did not at all affect his argument, or alter the meaning of the passage, it was not necessary that he should interrupt his subject by noticing it.

V. 9, 10. When David avowed the earnestness and boldness, with which he had celebrated the works and ways of God, he typified Christ in the performance of his prophetic office.—Neither reproach nor persecution had caused David to refrain his lips, from declaring before the congregation of Israel, the righteousness, faithfulness, lovingkindness, and salvation of the Lord. He had not been contented with treasuring up these subjects in his heart, for his private use: but had openly published them for the edification of the people, and the honour of God. Thus Christ, personally before his sufferings, and by his ministers afterwards, published to innumerable multitudes, the justice, truth, and mercy of God; his method of justifying and sanctifying sinners, as well as the ways of righteousness in which he guides them. (Notes, 1—5. xxii. 22—25. xxxv. 17—19. Heb. ii. 10—13.)—The connection of the term, "thy righteousness," with lovingkindness, mercy, faithfulness, and salvation; and the subject evidently intended, warrants this interpretation; and shews, that "the righteousness of God, which is unto all, and upon all, that believe," was primarily meant. (Note, Rom. iii. 21—26.)—The Hebrew word, rendered "preached," in the Old Testament, seemed precisely to signify preaching the gospel, proclaiming glad tidings, as a similar word, bashera, does in the Arabic.

V. 11, 12. David might be here pleading for an interest in those mercies and that salvation, which he proclaimed to others; when he was struggling with those complicated evils, which were consequent to his iniquities in the matter of Uriah. These called his other sins to his remembrance, which took such hold upon him, and so discouraged him, that he should not have dared to look up, if it had not been for his belief of the infinite mercies of God. But some think, that Christ may be supposed to speak, in the depth of his humiliation, when our innumerable iniquities met upon him, in his agony in the garden, and his sufferings on the cross. (Notes, Is. ix. 4. Is. liii. 4—7. Matt. xxvi. 36—39. xvii. 46.)—"Thou wilt not withhold," &c.

V. 13—15. The first of these verses is imperative, in which the psalmist simply prays for deliverance: the others are throughout in the future tense, and naturally express the language of lively faith and hope, rather than that of wishing or desiring the destruction foreseen and predicted; and the transition is worthy our notice. An undue regard to the Septuagint, and other ancient versions, seems to have induced our venerable translators generally to have put such passages in the imperative, which, at first view at least, gives them an appearance of harshness, not so congenial to the spirit of devotion. The two verses, however, viewed as predictions of the destruction, which awaits the obstinate enemies of Christ and his church, have been wonderfully accomplished in the dire end of many traitors and persecutors, and in the condition of the Jews to this day. (Notes, Is. ix. 22—28. ch. 6—20.)

V. 16. "All those, who seek thee, shall be glad and rejoice in thee; such as love thy salvation, shall say continually, The LORD be magnified." "I am confident, that this eventually will be the case; notwithstanding present temptations and sufferings." The clause, "love thy salvation," exactly discriminates a true believer from all other men. (Note, Ps. lxx. 1—5. Marg. Ref.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

We are here again called upon to contemplate the intense sufferings, into which our sins plunged the divine Saviour, when he willingly gave himself for us a sacrifice to God: and we should also mark his patient confidence in the Father under all; and observe how his prayers were heard, his soul delivered, and his body raised; and how, in human nature, he was exalted to be a Prince and a Saviour. In his exaltation all his people should rejoice: the new song, which was put into his mouth, was intended for our use, that we may render praises unto our God: (Note, Rev. v. 8—10: ) and the whole interesting scene, and all the mediatorial power and grace of our exalted Saviour, were designed to warn sinners to flee from the wrath to come, and to put their trust in the mercy of the Lord. Happy are all they, who renounce every lying vanity and carnal confidence, thus to depend upon the living God: they shall continually experience the faithfulness of his promises; and contemplate with admiring gratitude all the counsels of his love, and his wonderful works in behalf of his redeemed people: nor will they be able to eternity to exhaust the subject, or to recount all the particular instances of his mercy to them. Yet the incarnation and suretyship, the obedience and sufferings, of the Son of God, are the centre and the means of all other mercies to us. Thus is God glorified, and sinners saved: no costly sacrifices, or even moral righteousness, can be acceptable from sinners to a holy God; except as they stand in relation to the person and atonement of his beloved Son. In his obedience unto death the eternal purposes of JEHOVAH were accomplished; the types and prophecies of the old dispensation were fulfilled; the law of God was magnified, and the demands of justice were satisfied. Humiliating and painful as this obedience was, the loving Saviour delighted to perform it: the law of God possessed his heart, and he was bent upon honouring its precepts and its awful sanction; that all might learn the excellency of the command, and the evil of transgression, in connexion with the infinite love of God to sinners. Now, his redemption is completed, and the proclamation is sent forth to call upon us to come and accept of it. May we believe his testimony, trust his promise, and submit to his authority! For all, who thus seek the Lord, shall rejoice in him; and all "who love his salvation will say continually, The Lord be magnified:" whilst the shame and ruin of impenitent sinners, especially of those who oppose his cause, or seek to destroy his people, and rejoice in their calamities, are ensured by the predictions and denunciations of the word of God, and even by his intercession for his church.—But if the holy Jesus, "the beloved Son, in whom the Father was well pleased," endured such innumerable evils, and became so poor and needy for our sake; shall we, whose "iniquities are more in number than the hairs of our head," complain when we meet with pain and poverty! Had it not been for his voluntary and vicarious sufferings, "our sins" would "have taken such hold on us, that we should never have been able to look up;" "our hearts must indeed have failed," and in the horrible pit, whence there is no escape, our hopes would for ever have expired. Of this, believers are fully convinced; and this should teach them patient submission under every trial. And if any are struggling with remorse of conscience, and fears of wrath, and, to their own apprehension, sinking in a deep and horrible pit; let them wait patiently for God, and cry humbly unto him; and he will hear and help them, and turn their fears and sorrows into joyful praises. If we are thus rescued, let us continue to pray that "our goings may be established" in holiness, as a proof that we are fixed upon the Rock of salvation. And in order that our praises may be honourable to God and profitable to man, we should endeavour to unite humble dependence on Christ with obedient imitation of him. For those, who are really his, are taught to delight in doing his will, and have his law written in their hearts. Let us not then be ashamed of him or of his word: but declare his righteousness, truth, and salvation, according to our place in the church, to all around us. Let us put our whole trust in his mercy under every trial, and seek to him to make haste to help and deliver us; and to disappoint Satan and every foe, who seeketh after our souls to destroy them. Though despised and obscure, let it suffice us, that the Lord thinketh of us: and if he be our help and deliverer, he will make no long tarrying; but will soon remove us out of the reach of sin and sorrow: and at length raise our bodies from the grave, that we may be with him, and behold and share his glory for ever. V. 11—13. The psalmist, amidst his complicated trials, concluded with lively actings of faith and adoring praises. Had not God "favoured," or delighted in him, his enemy would certainly before that time have triumphed over him. (Notes, xxii. 7, 8. Is. xlii. 1—4. Matt. iii. 16, 17. xvii. 5—8. xxvii. 39—44.) He was still upheld in an upright and conscientious adherence to the cause of God and religion; and in assured hope of future felicity: and therefore he praised the LORD God of Israel, calling on all the people, by repeating earnestly "Amen," (or Let it be even so), to his zealous adorations, to make them their own. (Notes, lxxiii. 17—19. lxxxix. 52. cv. 47, 48. Matt. vi. 13.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The people of God are not exempted from poverty, sickness, or any external affliction: but he considers their case and wants, and vouchsafes them relief proportioned to the exigency; he delivers them from trouble, preserves their lives, and gives them blessings on earth, as long as this is really good for them: he does not give them over unto the will of their enemies; and even upon the bed of languishing sickness, which is so depressing to nature, he communicates such strength and consolation, as render them calm and easy. After the Lord's example of kindness and compassion, the believer has also learned to consider his poor and afflicted brethren. In them he sees the once suffering Saviour; and gratitude to him unites with love to his people, in disposing him to alleviate their sorrows, and supply their wants, according to his opportunity and ability: nor does he exclude any other sufferers from his deep compassion, and such relief as he can afford them. Thus he evidences the reality of his faith, and obtains the assurances of gracious supports from God, when afflictions fall to his share.—But nothing is so distressing to the contrite believer, as a sense of the Divine displeasure, guilt on his conscience, and the prevalence of sin in his heart: pain and sickness will remind him to pray especially for pardoning mercy; and for the healing of his soul, which is wounded and diseased, because he hath sinned against the Lord.—The most humble and upright may well expect to meet with enmity, contempt, treachery, and ingratitude from the wicked; when the holy Jesus was not only despised and rejected of men, but was betrayed and sold by one of his own apostles, whom he had treated with the utmost kindness, and distinguished by the most valuable external privileges. Let us continually look unto Jesus, that we may not be stumbled or discouraged, if, without cause, many calumniate or injure us, and wish for, and even seek to compass, our death, or rejoice and insult over our distresses and disgrace. Should any profess religion, and profess friendship to us, court our acquaintance, and insinuate themselves into our confidence and affection, on purpose to slander and betray us, let us still remember that Christ met with far baser treatment in all these respects, than we can do; and if we in any measure walk in his steps, we must expect a proportionate share of enmity, contempt, and ingratitude. (Notes, John xv. 17—21. 1 Pet. iv. 12—16.) He, being risen from the dead, and constituted judge of all, will requite all his obstinate enemies: but in our private capacity we must not desire to avenge ourselves, but copy his example, when he prayed for the forgiveness of his murderers. However we may be tempted and afflicted, it is a token for good, if Satan our enemy be not permitted to triumph over us: and if the Lord be merciful to us, and favour us, and uphold us in our integrity, “he will set us before his face for ever;” and then our enemies will finally be subdued, and all our sorrows terminated. In the anticipation of faith and hope, let us then on earth solace ourselves, under our conflicts and sorrows, by beginning the work of heaven: and give our cordial assent to those praises, which the redeemed are continually rendering to their God and Saviour; saying, “Blessed be the LORD God of Israel from everlasting, and to everlasting. Amen, and amen.”

PSALM XLIII.

The psalmist prays that God would judge his cause, and restore him to his sanctuary, 1-3. He anticipates his joy and praise on that occasion, and encourages himself to hope in God, 4, 5.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The believer, in proportion to the degree in which he is spiritually-minded, will either be rejoicing in the living God, or mourning after him. The thirsty hart does not more eagerly pant and bray for the refreshing stream, than the lively Christian desires the consolations of the Holy Spirit, and the tokens of the love and presence of God: nothing else can afford him satisfaction; and temptations, afflictions, and discouraging delays increase the spiritual appetite, and make him the more to thirst for these living waters. He therefore values public ordinances, and delights in attending on them; so that it is indeed a great affliction to him to be banished, or confined at a distance. Yet, unless he meet his God, and enjoy communion with him, he returns even from his courts disappointed and dissatisfied; and looks especially with longing expectation for that season, when he shall appear before him in the temple above, and be forever satisfied in his favour, and that joy with which his manifested glory fills every enraptured beholder. But the comfort of his hope is often abated, and even turned into mourning, in this evil world, by the insults and blasphemies of those, who deride his confidence in God, as presumption or delusion; especially when he is under divine rebukes, or bereft of external advantages. In such seasons of distress and prevailing iniquity, he recollects more pleasant and prosperous days, when he assembled with the people of God, and joined in his worship with the voice of joy and praise: and, comparing them with present trials, he is apt to yield to impatience and despondency. It behoves us, however under every distress, to call ourselves to account; and to enquire why we are so cast down and disquieted. We may have great cause to mourn for sin, and to pray against prevailing impiety: but our extreme dejection, even under the severest afflictions, or inward trials, springs from unbelief and a rebellious will: we should therefore strive and pray against it, and endeavour to hope in God, persuaded that we shall "yet praise him for the salvation of his countenance." Our enemies may indeed drive us from public ordinances, deprive us of our Bibles, banish us into deserts, or immure us in prisons; but they cannot bereave us of the favour of our God, or preclude our approach to the throne of grace. Let us then complain of ourselves unto him, and remember his mercy and power, under every disconsolation. And if one trouble follow hard after another; if divine rebukes from above, the assaults of hell from beneath, and the insults of men, like floods, waves, and waterspouts, seem to combine for our ruin: let us remember that they all are appointed and overruled by the Lord; and that we deserve more than all we endure on earth: let us recollect how Jesus said, "My soul is exceeding sorrowful, even unto death;" and how he suffered both from the cruelty of man, the rage of Satan, and the justice of the Father; yet was he heard and delivered. In his name, let us hope and pray: one word from him will calm every storm, turn the midnight darkness into the light of noon, and the bitterest complaints into joyful praises. We should then employ our time, under tedious and discouraging trials, in praising God for his mercies to his church and to us, and in prayer for deliverance. Ere long our night of sorrow will finally terminate, and eternal day will succeed. Let us then never think that "the God of our life," and "the Rock of our salvation hath forgotten us;" if we have indeed made his mercy, truth, and power our refuge. Even though we cannot but "go mourning, because of the oppression of the enemy;" and though the reproaches of the ungodly are painful as "a sword in our bones;" yet we should struggle against despondency; and still hope in God, and praise him: his favour will be the health and help of our souls, and he will be "our shield, and exceeding great reward."

NOTES.

PSALM XLIII. V. 1. This is evidently a continuation of the preceding psalm, and was written before David had obtained deliverance. Every day brought him fresh intelligence, concerning the ungodly, ungrateful, and unmerciful conduct of Israel in general; the bulk of the nation having joined the conspirators, and being ready to proceed to all lengths against the life of their aged king, which the deceit and iniquity of Absalom, or Ahithophel, could suggest against him. But these reports, instead of dismaying him, seem to have raised his hope; as they confirmed his confidence in the justice of his when covered with dust and sweat, having been long chased on a sultry day, is ready to faint and die, and pants, or brays, to quench his extreme thirst from the brooks of water. (Joel i. 20. Heb.) Thus David longed and mourned after the courts of God: but still more for the living God himself; for his presence and favour, and those pleasures which he had enjoyed in communion with him. (Notes, lxxii. 1-4. lxxxiv. 1, 2. cxliii. 6. Matt. v. 6. Rev. vii. 13-17.) The want of these consolations was the more grievous; because his former confidence was now openly derided, and it was thought that God had deserted him, and would not, or could not, afford him any relief. (Notes, 9, 10. iii. 1, 2. xxii. 7, 8.) These taunts and reproaches so distressed him, that he lost his appetite for his food, and tears were as his meat continually, his only solace and relief, day and night.

V. 4, 5. In this distressing situation, the psalmist recollected former times, till his soul was even "poured out," or melted, within him. He had been used to accompany the multitude to the house of God, upon their solemn feast-days; and he counted it his chief honour and happiness, to join in their sacred songs of joy and praise: (Notes, 2 Sam. vi. 12-15. 1 Chr. xv. xvi.) but now he was driven as an exile far from that sacred scene; and Jerusalem itself was profaned by the wickedness of his adversaries. Yet still he knew that he ought not to yield to despondency: he would therefore call his soul to account, for being thus cast down and disquieted; enquiring what adequate cause could be assigned for it. Past experience and express repeated promises combined to encourage his hope, that God would yet favour, comfort, and help him, which would be done effectually with a look or a smile; for "his presence is salvation." (Marg.) (Notes, 11. 1 Sam. xxx. 6.)

V. 6-8. As the psalmist's dejection continued, notwithstanding his struggles against it, he next complains of it to his God; being resolved to remember him with faith, and hope, and prayer, though he was apparently turned to be his enemy; and though he was banished from mount Zion, into a remote part of the land beyond Jordan, to some little hill in the land of Hermon; for the word Mizar is justly rendered, in other places, small, or little. (Marg. 2 Chr. xxiv. 24. Is. lxiii. 18. Heb.) His sorrows were so complicated, and his outward calamities and inward anguish so combined, that he was like a ship in a violent storm, when assailed by one billow after another, as if they called upon each other to concur in its destruction: while the waterspouts, rushing with impetuous force into the ocean with a dreadful noise, also called upon it to unite in overwhelming the astonished mariners, who sink into the deep, where all the waves and billows go over them. Thus David seemed ready to be swallowed up by his enemies; who, along with his inward distresses, were as waterspouts, waves, and billows, with which God seemed ready to overwhelm him for his sins. (Notes, lxxix. 14, 15. 2 Sam. xxii. 5, 6. Jon. ii. 3, 4.) Yet he trusted that he would command these storms into a calm: (Notes, cvii. 23-30. Matt. viii. 23-27.) In due season he hoped that God would discover his lovingkindness to him, which would be as the return of the day to his soul; and therefore he would praise him for the past, and make his prayer unto him, as the God of his life, even in the darkest night of sorrow and trouble. Or, he resolved to make the mercies of every day the subject of his praise, and the encouragement of his hope and prayer during the night-season, when pain or uneasiness prevented his sleep. (Job xxxv. 9-13. Is. xxx. 29-32. Acts xvi. 25-28.)

V. 9, 10. The psalmist was sensible, that God was chastening him for his sins; but he was also conscious of being truly penitent. He likewise knew that his cause was that of God and righteousness, and that his enemies hated him for his religion. So that he could not but wonder, on what account God, his rock, (Note, 2 Sam. xxii. 2, 3.) so long forgot his servant, and left his oppressors to prosper; while they put him to extreme torture, by their impious sarcasms and reproaches. (Note, 1-3.)

V. 11. "This repetition doth declare, that David did not overcome at once; to teach us to be constant, for as much as God will certainly deliver his." The concluding words are rather varied: "The salvations of my countenance, and my God." (Note, 4, 5.) The deliverances and consolations of God, his salvation, had often made the psalmist lift up his face with joy and gladness; and he trusted he should again praise him for similar mercies.

PSALM XLV.

The excellency, dignity, and deity of the Messiah, with his victories and dominion, 1-3. The Church, as espoused to him; her attendants and ornaments; with coincident exhortations and promises, 9-17.

To the chief Musician upon "Shoshannim, for the sons of Korah, "Maschil, "A song of loves.

MY heart is inditing a good matter: I speak of the things which I have made touching the king: my tongue is the pen of a ready writer.

doleful conclusions as to the event. (Notes, lx. 1-3. lxxiv. 1, 2. lxxix 1-5. lxxxix. 38-45. Josh. vi. 6-9. Is. i. 1-3. Marg. Ref.)

V. 17-22.—Certainly we have deserved them all, (those calamities;) though this comfort is still remaining, that we are not so wicked as to be moved by all this, to desert thee, and violate that covenant, whereby we are engaged to worship thee alone. (Bp. Patrick.) The formalist commonly escapes persecution, by turning with the stream, and purchasing security with sinful compliances, or open apostasy: but the true church of God cannot be prevailed on, by menaces, sufferings, or promises, to forget God, or deal falsely in his covenant: and as the believer's heart doth not turn back from God, so his feet do not decline from his way. Neither the malice, subtlety, nor poison of the old serpent, and of his progeny, even when permitted to torment him grievously, can induce him to turn aside to idolatry, or to renounce his God and Saviour. This hath been proved in ten thousand instances, whilst the disciples of Christ have been covered as with the shadow of death, in their constant expectation of it; and they have seen their brethren killed, by every tedious excruciating method, "all the day long, and accounted as sheep for the slaughter." (Notes, John xvi. 1-3. Rom. viii. 35-39.) Their regard to the authority of their holy heart-searching God effectually preserves them even from secret wickedness; and they make their appeal to him concerning their integrity. And indeed so far from suffering for their iniquities, they are hated and killed for the Lord's sake; because they bear his image, profess his truths, adhere to his commandments, and seek his glory. "The place of dragons," or serpents, or monsters, gives the idea of man cast into a situation in which every hateful and dreadful creature surrounded him. Such are persecutors, and such are evil spirits who employ them. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 23-26. In this trying situation, the church earnestly cries for help to God, by whose permission these afflictions come upon her, and who alone can remove them. (Notes, xii. 5, 6. xxxv. 21, 22. lxxiv. 10-12. lxxix. 8-13. Is. li. 9-11. Matt. viii. 23-27.) The company of believers plead their great misery; through oppression, and inward dejection, they are thrown prostrate, and trampled in the dust, and even cleave to the ground, as utterly unable to arise; and as God had sold them, so they pray him to redeem them by his power, and through the appointed ransom, that his mercies may be glorified in their help and deliverance. (Marg. Ref.)—There is a time, when the triumphs of the enemy, and the afflictions of the church, tempt men to think, that the eye of Providence is closed, or turned away; or that the Almighty had ceased to remember their sad estate. But the truth is, that God only giveth his people an opportunity of feeling their own insufficiency; and waiteth, till, by fervent and importunate prayer, they solicit his help. For so the holy Jesus slept, while the ship was covered with the waves; until, awakened by the cries of his disciples, he arose to their assistance, and spoke the tempest into a perfect calm. (Horne.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The church of God is one incorporated body, from the beginning to the end of the world: and the benefits conferred on it in every age, will be acknowledged with gratitude by believers, through all generations, and even to eternity.—"Whatsoever things were written of old time, were written for our instruction," and encouragement; and parents should declare the work of God to their children, that they may learn to hope in him. (Notes, lxxviii. 3-8. Is. xxxviii. 17-20.) When we hear of the wonderful works wrought for Israel, in bringing them out of Egypt, and settling them in Canaan; or of the still more glorious interpositions of God, in the first promulgation of his gospel; we should learn to hope, and pray, for displays of his power and love, equally efficacious, though not miraculous.—The prosperity of the church has always been attended with the ruin of her enemies; therefore the most prosperous despisers and persecutors have cause to tremble, on account of the prayers of God's afflicted and despised people.—As human policy, power, and authority could never prevail against the cause of God; so they have been very little employed in promoting it: but, whatever instruments have been used, all real advantages have been gained by "his right hand, his arm, and the light of his countenance, because he had a favour" to his people. They therefore give him the whole glory of the past, and entirely confide in him for the future; and they prosper in their spiritual warfare, when they depend on his grace, and go forth in his name. "Where the word of this King is, there is power;" when he commands deliverances for Jacob, they will take place: and we may "push down all our enemies," and

"tread them under that rise up against us;" when, like the servants of God of old, we disclaim all self-confidence, to trust in him alone. The Lord hath always hitherto saved his people: they may now "boast in him all the day long;" and they will praise his name for ever, for not having made them ashamed of their confidence. Yet, the believer must have seasons of temptations, afflictions, and humiliating discouragements; and the church must have seasons of persecution, when her remaining witnesses prophesy in sackcloth. (Note, Rev. xi. 3-6.) At such times the people of God will be trampled on, put to shame, plundered, murdered, banished, enslaved, despised, and reproached: and they will be ready to think that he hath cast them off, and to fear that his name and truth will be eventually dishonoured; whilst they continually hear the blasphemies and triumphs of his enemies. But in all our afflictions, especially in our sufferings for the sake of scriptural Christianity, we should complain unto the Lord, and "exercise ourselves to have a conscience void of offence;" we should be careful not to seek relief by sinful compliances; and should continually meditate on the power, truth, purity, and knowledge of our heart-searching God. If our heart turn back from him, or our steps decline from his way; he knows it, and will discover it to others. But if we are faithful to our engagements, and are persecuted for righteousness' sake, we are and shall be safe and happy. Even if we should be given up into the hands of enemies, formidable and venomous as dragons, and thrown into dungeons hideous as their holes; be sore broken with every torture which malice can invent, and live in the continual expectation of a violent death: yet nothing can "separate us from the love of our God;" none can go beyond his purpose and permission; and in all these things we shall be more than conquerors; (Notes, Rom. viii. 28-39;) for though he seems to hide his face, and to forget the affliction and oppression of his people, whilst they are trampled in the dust by antichristian persecutors; yet he is waiting for our more fervent prayers, which will cause him, as it were, to awake, and arise, and help, and redeem us for his mercies' sake. We have reason to be thankful, considering our frailty, for exemption from the more violent species of persecution; but let us be careful, that prosperity and ease do not render us careless and lukewarm. We should remember that persecution may come on us speedily, and that we ought to prepare for it; and we should not forget the state of the church, not yet delivered from her bondage and captivity. But in answer to the Redeemer's intercession and the prayers of his people, all that hate his cause shall be put to shame; truth and righteousness shall every where triumph; and none that belong to Christ shall be cast off for ever, but every one of them shall be completely and eternally saved.

NOTES.

PSALM XLV. Title. The word "Shoshannim" signifies lilies, and is several times so rendered in Canticles: as used, however, in the titles of a few psalms, it is generally understood to mean an instrument of six strings.—This psalm is entitled "A song of loves;" and it evidently describes the mutual love, which subsists between Christ and his church. In many respects it resembles the Song of Solomon; and it treats of this spiritual union under the allusion of a marriage. Most expositors maintain that it was written on Solomon's marriage with Pharaoh's daughter; but a great part of it is wholly inapplicable to that transaction: nor is there sufficient ground to support the decided opinion, that this was so much as the occasion of its being written, or that David composed it. The latter is indeed probable; but it is entirely a prophecy of Christ, and is quoted at such by the apostle. (Heb. i. 9.)

V. 1. The inspiration of the Holy Spirit stirred up in the prophet's heart this meditation, on a most excellent and important subject, as water bubbles up in a fountain: so that he spake freely of "the things, which he had been considering, and had composed concerning the King," the promised Messiah; and his tongue was guided by the Spirit of God, as entirely, as the pen is by the hand of a ready writer, to express promptly and fully "the mind of the Spirit," and nothing more. This seems the genuine meaning: for as the tongue utters more rapidly than the readiest writer can note down the words; the clause, in the common interpretation, conveys no distinct idea. (Notes, 2 Sam. xxiii. 1, 2. John xvi. 14, 15. 1 Cor. 10-13. 1 Pet. i. 10-12. 2 Pet. i. 19-21.)

V. 2. In speaking "concerning the King," the prophet was led abruptly to address him, as one in a rapture whilst he contemplated his glorious excellencies: for he unspeakably surpassed all, who ever were admired or extolled on earth,

3 'Gird thy sword upon thy thigh, 'O most mighty, with thy glory and thy majesty.

4 And in thy majesty ride prosperously, "because of truth and meekness and righteousness; and thy right hand shall teach thee terrible things.

5 'Thine arrows are 'sharp in the heart of the king's enemies: whereby the people fall under thee.

6 'Thy throne, 'O God, is for ever and ever: 'the sceptre of thy kingdom is a right sceptre.

7 'Thou lovest righteousness, and 'hatest wickedness: therefore 'God, 'thy God, 'hath anointed thee with 'the oil of gladness above thy fellows.

8 'All thy garments smell of myrrh, and aloes, and 'cassia, out of 'the ivory palaces, 'whereby they have made thee glad.

9 'Kings' daughters were among thy honourable women: 'upon thy right hand did stand 'the queen in 'gold of Ophir.

16 'Instead of thy fathers shall be 'thy children, whom thou mayest make 'princes in all the earth.

17 'I will make thy name to be remembered in all generations: 'therefore shall the people praise thee for ever and ever.

for wisdom, justice, truth, and love; without having any intermixture of infirmity or defect. His word reveals the unsearchable riches of his grace: and, being authorized to speak to sinners, as their Prophet, in the Father's name, "grace is poured into his lips," and his words are full of energy, instruction, persuasion, and consolation: and being in every respect fully qualified for his mediatorial work, God hath exalted and blessed him for ever, in order to the completion of it.—His word instructed the ignorant, resolved the doubtful, comforted the mourners, reclaimed the wicked, silenced his adversaries, healed diseases, controlled the elements, and raised the dead.' (Horne.) (Notes, Cant. v. 10-16. Is. i. 4. Luke iv. 16-22. John vii. 40-53.)

V. 3-5. The prophet here joyfully foretels the progress and success of the Messiah, in setting up his kingdom and overcoming his enemies. Girt with the word of truth, rendered effectual by the power of the Holy Spirit, as with a sharp sword, let him ride forth as a mighty conqueror, in unrivalled might, glory, and majesty, to spread truth, meekness, and righteousness on earth: (Notes, Is. lxxii. 1-6. Lev. vi. 1, 2. xix. 11-16:) bringing his people into a state of acceptance and peace with God; and teaching them to live in humble meekness, peace, and equity with each other. For his right hand, expert in this warfare, would readily execute his purposes, whether of mercy or of vengeance. (Notes, ii. 7-9. cx. 3-6.) His arrows of conviction are very sharp, and the effects of them very terrible, for a time, in the hearts of sinners, till they are humbled, subjected, and reconciled: but the arrows of his righteous vengeance are unspeakably more sharp and dreadful to his obstinate enemies, when they fall under that power to which they refused to submit. (Notes, xxi. 8-13. lxxvi. 1-3. lxxvii. 17-23.)

V. 6, 7. The victorious Conqueror is here introduced as placed on his royal throne; and the prophet not only celebrates him as far superior to all the sons of men, but as being himself "God over all." His everlasting kingdom, which he possesses for the benefit of his church, is administered with perfect wisdom and equity; his character, doctrine, precepts, and, above all, his atoning sacrifice, shew that he loveth righteousness and hateth iniquity." Therefore God the Father, as "his God," in respect of his human nature and mediatorial offices, (Note, John xx. 11-17,) hath given him the Holy Spirit, without measure; that, being thus anointed to be our Prophet, Priest, and King, he might have the pre-eminency in the gladdening gifts and graces of the Holy Spirit, the Comforter; and from his fulness might communicate them to his fellows, his brethren in the human nature. (Notes, Is. lix. 20, 21. John i. 16. iii. 27-36. Eph. iv. 7-13.) Various attempts have, in different ages, been made to explain away this decisive testimony to the deity of Christ; but the manner in which the apostle quotes it, rather varied from the Septuagint and made more energetic, is conclusive to all who admit his authority.—Some would render the words, "God is thy throne for ever and ever." Heaven is the throne of God; but who ever heard of God being the throne of any of his creatures? (Note, Heb. i. 8, 9. Marg. Ref.)

V. 8. The garments of princes were generally imbued with costly perfumes; those of the high priests were anointed with the holy ointment, composed of the spices here mentioned, with several others. (Note, cxxiii. 2. Ex. xxx. 22-33.) Thus the Messiah is represented as clothed with garments, which diffuse a refreshing fragrance through his royal palace, his church on earth, and in heaven, in which he more rejoices, than magnificent princes do in palaces inlaid with ivory. (Marg. Ref. Note, xxi. 1-7.) 'From the glorious vestments of our High Priest and King is diffused the sweet savour of his heavenly graces, filling those happy regions of joy and gladness, where he keeps his residence above; and, by the communications of his Spirit refreshing the faithful on earth, with their odours. (Horne.)

V. 9-11. The King, now seated in majesty and glory on his throne, is next represented as surrounded with a splendid train. Among other honourable women, the daughters of kings are mentioned, who may be supposed to have submitted to his authority, and put themselves under his protection; and who would deem it an honour for their daughters to wait, in his court, around his queen; whilst she, arrayed in the costliest robes, stood at his right hand, as a bride adorned for her nuptials. By "the queen," the collective body of believers seems to be intended, who, clothed in the righteousness enriched by the bounty, and adorned by the graces of the Spirit of Christ, adhered to him in singleness of affection and fidelity, and are admitted to the most endeared union and communion. The other attendants are either introduced, according to the customs of the times on such occasions, to keep up the allegory; or they may mean distinct churches or individuals who in succession seek to be admitted into this sacred relation. (Notes, 12-15. Cant. i. 5, 6, v. 9.) The royal consort is next exhorted, as it seems, by the Father himself, to hearken, consider, and consent to, the terms of this union; and, in order to enter into it, and act properly in it, she must forget her own people, and her father's house. The whole church, composed of Jews and Gentiles, consists of such as were born in sin; and separation from all idolatry, iniquity, and self-dependence; and from all the carnal interests, pleasures, and attachments of an unconverted state, must make way for receiving Christ as their whole portion and salvation. (Note, Gen. xii. 1-3.) When grace hath thus prepared the heart, there is a spiritual beauty, with which the Redeemer is greatly delighted; and the soul is ready to submit to him as Lord, and to worship him as God, with unreserved obedience and humble adoration; as well as to cleave to him in love, and trust in him as a Saviour. (Notes, Cant. iv. 8-14. Is. liv. 4, 5. lxxii. 1-5. John iii. 27-36. 2 Cor. xi. 1-6. Eph. v. 22-27. Rev. xix. 7, 8.)

V. 12. The accession of the Gentiles to the church may be here predicted, under the name of Tyre, a neighbouring city, and at that time the mart of the world: for even the richest among the nations will in due time submit, and consecrate their wealth, to the Messiah; and court the friendship, and desire the prayers of his church. (Notes, Is. lx. 3-14. Zech. viii. 18-23. Rev. iii. 8, 9.)

V. 13-15. The relation, in which the believer stands to the Lord, comprises in it every tie and affection; and the church is called spouse, sister, or daughter, indiscriminately: or the title "spouse," or "bride," may refer to the Son of God, that of "daughter" to the Father. Her glory and beauty are inward and spiritual: and her adorning is most precious; as she is arrayed with the righteousness which Christ wrought out in human nature for her justification, and with the beauties of a holy conversation by the operation of the Spirit of God; who works by the labours of ministers, and by all the means, which others diligently use, to promote the sanctification of themselves and of their brethren. (Notes, 1 Pet. iii. 1-6. Rev. xix. 7, 8.) When the church is thus prepared, this union is begun on earth, which will be completed and avowed in the King's palace above: whilst every individual, whose affection and dependence have been singly placed on Christ, shall be admitted as a guest at these nuptials, and likewise share for ever in the joy and honour of this sacred union. (Matt. xxv. 1-13. Marg. Ref.)

V. 16. While the church forgets and renounces all worldly connections interests, and affections, in order to her espousal to Christ, a spiritual progeny, a numerous succession of converts, arises from this new and sacred relation. (Notes, xxii. 30, 31. Gen. xii. 1-3. Matt. xix. 29, 30. 2 Cor. vi. 14-18. Phil. iii. 8-11.) These are "kings and priests to our God, and reign even on earth," as in reality the most honourable persons in every land. (Notes, 1 Pet. ii. 4-6. 9, 10. Rev. i. 4-6. v. 8-10.) Many of them have been raised to great authority and possessed great influence in their several countries: and, however the church hath hitherto been generally despised and persecuted; the time is coming when her sons shall be made kings and rulers through all nations, as well as heirs of an eternal kingdom in heaven. (Notes, Is. xlix. 18-23. liv. 1-5. lx. 1-5. lxx. 13-16. Gal. iv. 21-31.)—Instead of Jewish ancestors, or kindred, an illustrious race of gentle believers, 'of whom were to be chosen Christian kings to govern the world, and Christian bishops to govern the church.' (Ep. Hare.)—But the church renounces none of the Jewish race, but unbelievers, in exactly the same way as she renounces unbelieving gentiles.

V. 17. This verse shews, that Christ and the church were, immediately and expressly, intended throughout the psalm. The language is peculiarly emphatical; and can mean nothing less, than all successive generations to the end of the world, and likewise eternal ages in heaven. Either the Father himself thus declared his purpose of glorifying his beloved Son, and his people with him, for ever: or, as many explain it, the psalmist foresaw, that this sacred poem would be by the church through all generations, in celebrating the honour of the Redeemer, and in calling on others to do the same; and that it would thus be useful in preparing the redeemed people of God, for the exalted adorations of the eternal world.—There can be no doubt, but that this will be verified by the event. (Notes, lxxi. 17, 18. lxxii. 17—19.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—9. The difference of men's characters, before God, greatly consists in the thoughts which habitually occupy their minds. The lively believer has his memory, imagination, and affections, so stored with heavenly things, that he has commonly some good matter to meditate on, in those hours of solitude and leisure, which others waste in vanity, or employ in wicked and polluting speculations. (Note, cxix. 113.) But no subject is so congenial to the heaven-born soul, or so replete with comfort and instruction, as the contemplation of the excellencies of Christ our King. Lively thoughts of his person, character, and grace, springing up in the heart, inspire a heavenly savour into the discourse: and without the gift of prophecy, our tongues in this case become as the pen of a ready writer, simply and promptly declaring to all around us the truths originally revealed by the Spirit of God.—In the Redeemer, the enlightened soul perceives unutterable goodness and beauty, which eclipse all the dim excellencies, that it was wont to admire in the children of men. The gracious words which he speaks to sinners, are replete with divine harmony, and excite ineffable comfort in the broken heart; and Christ himself rejoices in his exaltation, and in the power and glory which the Father hath conferred on him; because he delights in bestowing on his people the blessings, which he purchased for them on the cross.—All, who have seen his glory and tasted his grace, greatly desire to promote his cause: they rejoice in his former victories, and long to see him "ride forth in his majesty" to extend his conquests; and by his word and Spirit, to reduce enemies and strangers to a willing submission to his truth, and righteousness, and gentle dominion. But, whilst he delighteth in salvation, his powerful right hand will teach him to execute dreadful vengeance on all impenitent opposers: his sharp arrows will penetrate their souls; and all must either yield to this almighty King, or be crushed by him. For his throne is established for ever; his name is Emmanuel; his sceptre is swayed in justice and mercy; "he loveth righteousness and hateth iniquity;" and whilst his Spirit leads believers to look unto him, as "bearing our sins in his own body on the cross," and to rest all their hopes on his atonement; the views which they receive of this great transaction, especially impress them with a sense of the odiousness and desert of every transgression, of the reasonableness of obedience, and teach them the beauty of holiness; so that, not one of them can possibly abuse his grace for an encouragement to continue in sin.—In proportion as we are conformed to his holy image, we may expect the gladdening influence of the Comforter, which is communicated from his fulness: and whilst his name is to us, "as ointment poured forth;" the fragrant of heavenly affections will recommend our conversation to the spiritually minded, and render us meet for his palace above.

V. 10—17. Next to the Redeemer's excellencies, those of his espoused church are most worthy to be celebrated: not for what she was in itself; but for what he hath made her, in consequence of his love and choice. (Notes, Cant. iv. 1—15. vi. 4—10. vii. 7—9. Ez. xvi. 9—14.) If we desire to share these blessings, we must hearken to his word, consider his proposals, and incline our ears and our hearts to seek an union with him: we must renounce, and even forget, our carnal and sinful attachments, pursuits, and connections, if we would be pleasing in his eyes, or admitted into this honourable relation. Other lords must be disavowed; for he must be our Lord, as well as our Saviour: and all idols must be thrown away, that we may give him our whole heart, and render him unreserved worship, as well as seek all our happiness from him alone. (Note, Gen. ii. 24. xxiv. P. O. 33—67.) Indeed, the true believer's privileges, as well as the most estimable parts of his character, are internal, and undiscerned by an ungodly world: yet the holiness of his conversation proves the inward adorning of his soul, and that he is arrayed with "the robe of righteousness and salvation."—No wonder that the prosperity of the Redeemer's cause, and the conversion of sinners to him, delight all those on earth, who are pure and upright in heart; seeing, angels who never sinned, "rejoice over one sinner that repenteth:" what then will be the joy, and mutual congratulations, and harmonious praises, which shall attend the final admission of all the redeemed to the full possession of their purchased inheritance!—They who are taught of God, however great in the world, will count it their honour to attend on Christ our King, and to employ their wealth and influence for the good of his church. And they, who leave all for him, shall be abundantly compensated even in this world, in new and spiritual relations, friends, and honours. To be a child of God, to be espoused to Christ, and made an heir of heaven, are the highest of all possible distinctions: this honourable race shall be continued and multiplied until the end of time; and at length possess and fill the earth: and thus shall the name of the Redeemer be remembered in all generations, and his people praise him for ever and ever. Amen, and amen.

NOTES.

PSALM XLVI. Title. As the sons of Korah were principal singers in the sanctuary through successive generations, the title alone does not determine the date of this psalm. It is not known by whom, or when, it was written: but the ancient opinion, that it was composed on occasion of the deliverance of Jerusalem from Sennacherib's invasion is very probable; though some think it was composed by David, after his victories over the Ammonites and Syrians. (Notes, xlviii. 1.) It is, however, well adapted to the use of the church, especially in great emergencies, in every age.—When Luther received any discouraging news, he used to say, "Come, let us sing the forty-sixth psalm."

Alamoth. (Note, 1 Chr. xv. 20, 21.) 'Alamoth is thought to be either some tune in common use, or some kind of musical instrument, unknown to us; in which young virgins, as some fancy, took a peculiar delight, and were wont to learn to play upon it, which they make the reason and original of its name.' (Bp. Patrick.)—"Alamoth" signifies virgins.

V. 1—3. (Note, xxvii. 1—3.) The clause, "a very present help in trouble," may be rendered more literally, "found exceedingly a help in troubles;" or, "a help most readily to be found in troubles." The psalmist's experience, and that of all believers from the beginning, evinced it; and this encouraged his present unshaken confidence: whereas all, who call on idols, or any creature, to help them in trouble, are invoking the absent, as well as helpless.—Earthquakes, and other terrible convulsions in nature, are often made emblems of the raging of nations, the fall of empires, revolutions, and other public calamities. But if imagination should be employed to conceive of such desolations, as are not likely to be realized, in the full literal import of the terms here used, till the consummation of all things; still the presence and power of an almighty protector and upholder would suffice to secure the church and every true member of it: and strong faith would exclude terror even in the prospect of such tremendous scenes. (Notes, Is. xxv. 9. xxvi. 3, 4, 20, 21. xxxii. 14—19. Luke xii. 25—28. 2 Pet. iii. 10—13.)

V. 4. Perhaps the gentle streams which watered Jerusalem may be alluded to: but "the river of the water of life," the graces and consolations of the Holy Spirit, which pervade every part of the church, the city of our God; and through which his sacred ordinances revive and rejoice the hearts of afflicted believers, are particularly intended. (Notes, Ez. xlvii. 5, 6. Is. vii. 6—8. Ez. xlvi. 1—10. John iv. 10—15. vii. 37—39. Rev. xxii. 1—5.)

V. 5. (Notes, Is. xii. 4—6. Zeph. iii. 14—17. Zech. ii. 10—13. Matt. xxviii. 19, 20. Marg. Ref.)—Right early. Or, "When the morning appeareth:" that is, 'In good time, when the help shall be most honourable to God, and profitable to his people.'

V. 6. Nothing can be more concise, energetic, and sublime than this verse. (Note, Ez. x. 9, 10.)—Many deliverances afforded to Israel answer the description, especially that under Hezekiah: but the success of the gospel, notwithstanding all opposition, which melted away before the blessing of God on the preaching of the apostles and evangelists, was a singular accomplishment of it; (Notes, ii. 1—6. Marg. Ref.); and it shall ere long have a still more glorious completion, in the destruction of every antichrist, and the universal prevalence of genuine Christianity.

V. 7. 'The LORD of armies, the God of Jacob, who redeemed him from all evil, is with us his descendants, according to his promise: what then have we

The psalmist here calls on all people, to contemplate the wonders which God had wrought for his church, and the desolations which he had made among her powerful enemies: for he had made wars to cease to the ends of the earth, by disabling all who had delighted in them. (Notes, 2 Kings xix. 35-37. 2 Chr. xxi. 21-30.)—He will hereafter put an end to all wars, by the universal success of the gospel of peace; and this event also may be foretold. (*Notes, Is. ii. 2-5. ## PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

They who have received Jesus Christ as their Lord and Saviour, and live in grateful obedience to him, make the power, wisdom, truth, and love of God, their refuge and strength; and in every urgent danger and trouble, they will find him a ready and a present help. If our faith were as strong as our security is good, we need fear no combination of enemies, no revolutions in kingdoms, and no convulsions in nature; but in the most tremendous dangers, might triumph in the fullest assurance of security and victory. Were we literally to behold the deep-rooted mountains torn from their foundations, and cast into the ocean, whilst its impetuous waves overflowed the banks and deluged the earth; we should not yet be safe, but might be happy, if, in communion with God, we drank of the river of divine consolations, which he hath communicated to his holy church on earth, as an earnest of heavenly joys. Let us then pray for increase of faith, and be careful to lay up our treasures in heaven: thus, when the earth and all its works shall be burnt up, we shall have nothing to fear, or to lose. Happy are they, in every case, who are enrolled citizens of the holy city of our God, in which he dwells as a father, a defender, and a comforter of his people. While the heathen rage, their faith and patience will indeed be tried; yet He will utter his voice, their enemies will perish, and they shall triumph in praise. But let the ungodly tremble at beholding the destruction of those who have opposed the church: soon the Lord will convert or destroy every adversary; and "the nations shall beat their swords into ploughshares, and learn war no more." Let us pray for the speedy approach of these glorious days, and, in silent reverence and submission, worship and trust in our almighty Sovereign. And through life and death, let us answer every fear with, "The Lord of hosts is with us, the God of Jacob is our refuge."

NOTES.

PSALM XLVII. V. 1—3. This psalm is generally ascribed to David, though his name is not affixed to it: and it is thought to have been composed when vast multitudes were assembled, to attend on the removal of the ark to the tabernacle on Mount Zion. (Notes, 2 Sam. vi. 1 Chr. xv.) And as the ark was a type of Christ, the psalm has been applied to his ascension, after his humiliation on earth, to the right hand of God in heaven. Thus the ancient fathers understood it, and on this account it is appointed in our church to be read on Ascension-day. (Notes, xxiv. 7—10. lxviii. 1—3.)—Numbers being assembled, as at a solemn festival, the psalmist calls on them to express the overflowing joy of their hearts, by clapping their hands, and lifting up their voices in triumphant shouting: (Marg. Ref.) because the most high God, whom Israel worshipped, and who protected Israel, was terrible to his and to their enemies, and the great sovereign of all the earth.—In the days of Joshua, and afterwards by David, he had subdued the nations of Canaan and the adjacent countries, and brought them under the dominion of Israel: but these victories were only shadows of the spiritual triumphs of the church under her king Messiah; and at length all nations shall either be joined to her in subjection to Christ, or shall be destroyed. (Notes, Dan. ii. 44. Rev. xi. 15—18.)—Terrible. (2.) The same word (arabab) is rendered rejoyced (xxi. 9.)

V. 4. The goodly land of Canaan was selected for the inheritance of Jacob's posterity, who were especially favoured by God, and comparatively the excellent of the earth. But they have long been excluded from that country:

which typified the present privileges and chosen inheritance of the true Israel, who are in reality what the Israelites were in external character. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 5. 'God is gone up, by the special token of his presence, into the holy place, with shouts of joy and praise.' (Bp. Patrick.) If, however, we consider this as prefiguring the ascension of Him, in our nature, who is "God over all, blessed for evermore;" and the acclamations of the heavenly hosts on that grand occasion; the whole appears vastly more interesting, and becomes in the highest degree animated, and appropriate, as introductory to the repeated call to fervent praises. (Notes, lxxvii. 17—20. 24, 25. Luke xxiv. 50—53. Acts i. 9—11. Eph. iv. 7—10. Phil. ii. 9—11.)

V. 6, 7. Our King, &c. (Notes, ii. 4—6. xlv. 1—5. Zeph. iii. 14—17. Zech. ix. 9, 10. xiv. 6—9. Matt. xxv. 34—40.) The Messiah is continually celebrated in the psalms as Israel's king; it is therefore most natural to interpret this expression of him in almost every part of them; which leads us to multiplied proofs that he is JEHOVAH, and the Lord of all.

V. 8, 9. The dominion of that God, who dwelt in the holy place, by the ark, the symbol of his presence, above the mercy-seat, over the nations of the earth, as here mentioned, seems a clear intimation of the calling of the Gentiles into the church, in consequence of Christ's ascension. (Rom. xv. 12.)—All the principal persons from the several tribes of Israel, “the people of the God of Abraham,” assembled to remove the ark, leaving the protection of their houses and families unto God, who accordingly was the shield of the land. Thus when princes and rulers join themselves to the Lord Jesus, and use their authority and influence for the benefit of the church; God is greatly exalted, in becoming the shield and defender of their dominions. Some, however, interpret the last clause, to mean the rulers themselves; who, belonging to God, having their authority from him, and using it according to his command, become the shields of their people; and thus by their means God is greatly exalted and honoured among men.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The universal and absolute sovereignty of our holy God would be most terrible to every sinner, were it not administered by his incarnate Son from a mercy-seat: but now, it is terrible to the obstinate workers of iniquity alone.— Whilst his peculiar people express their confidence, gratitude, and joy, by every token of external exultation, and animate each other in his service; his sinners submit to his authority, and accept of his salvation, that they may share in this holy triumph. If we are the chosen people of God, and his love and grace have made us more excellent than our unbelieving neighbours; we may be sure that he hath chosen for us a more excellent inheritance than all the kingdoms of the world; and that he will prepare our souls for that inheritance, by every dispensation here on earth. Let us then confide in his wisdom, submit to his will, and be thankful for his distinguishing mercy. As angels and glorified saints worshipped the ascending Saviour, and welcomed him with shouts of joy and the trump of God; surely we on earth should join our praises with holy affections; and with understanding of his excellency and our obligations, that we may glorify him, and edify others also. Our backwardness to this reasonable service must be overcome by repeated exhortations; and when our hearts are attuned to this holy worship, we should call on all around to unite in it: for he is our King, “and the King of all the earth.” “He reigneth upon the throne of his holiness,” which yet well consists with his plenteous mercy: all the heathen are his inheritance and property; may he hasten the time, when all kings shall serve him, and use their delegated authority to his glory! Then will “all the families of the earth be blessed in him,” and he will be greatly exalted: whilst, as the God of Abraham, he becomes their “shield, and exceeding great reward.”

PSALM XLVIII. V. 1. Many think, that this psalm was composed on account of the deliverance of Jerusalem from the power and rage of Sennacherib: but others are of opinion, that it is more exactly descriptive of the invasion of the land, during the reign of Jehoshaphat, and the extraordinary triumph of him and his subjects over the kings who had confederated against him. (Notes, 2 Chr. xx.) It is, however, evident that it was occasioned by some remarkable interposition of God, in rescuing "the mountain of his holiness" from powerful assailants.

V. 2, 3. The situation of Zion, with the adjacent region, was very beautiful, and the glory and joy of the whole land: but the experience of her kings, from age to age, that God was their refuge, and the protector of their palaces, was the peculiar honour of this holy city.—Zion is supposed to have been situated on the south-side of the mountain; but the temple stood on the north side of the mountain, and was its peculiar honour and distinction. (Note, Is. xiv. 12-15.)

V. 4-7. The confederated kings, of idolatrous nations, were assembled to besiege Jerusalem; but the pious princes of Judah confided in God as their refuge. Their invaders therefore, when they approached the walls, were suddenly intimidated, troubled, and put to flight, with terror and anguish, as a woman in travail; or as the affrighted mariners look at each other, when a furious east-wind drives their stout and richly laden ship upon a rock, and dashes it in pieces. These effects could not be so much ascribed to the sight of Jerusalem's fortifications, as to the immediate power of God; even as the winds and waves are at his command. (Marg. Ref.) *Illustrations of this kind are sometimes introduced, by the sacred writers, without the mark of comparison. The meaning evidently is, that as the east wind shatters in pieces the ships of Tarshish, so the Divine power struck the heathen kings with terror and astonishment. (Horne.)

V. 8. The princes and people of Judah had often heard of the wonderful deliverances, which God had in former ages vouchsafed to Israel, as well as the encouraging promises and predictions sent to them by the prophets: but the recent events, of which they had been eye-witnesses, and the astonishing interposition of the God of armies in behalf of this chosen city, impressed them with a far more lively sense of these things, than they ever before had attained to: and they were also encouraged, by this instance of the Lord's faithful and powerful protection, confidently to expect that he would establish Jerusalem in safety and prosperity through all generations.—As a prophecy, this must mean that city of the living God, of which Jerusalem was but a type: (Notes, Gal. iv. 21-31. Heb. xii. 22-25. Rev. xxi.) for Jerusalem was repeatedly taken, and at length it was given up to be trodden under foot by the gentiles; but the church of Christ is founded on a rock, and God will certainly establish it for ever and ever.

V. 9. 'We have waited in silent contemplation and patient hope, for thy lovingkindness, with sacrifices and believing prayers, presented at thy temple; trusting in thy aid, and not in our own power or valour.' This was the conduct of Hezekiah, amidst the manaces and blasphemies of Rabshakeh and Sennacherib; yet the conduct of Jehoshaphat and his subjects seem more exactly to accord to these words, than even that of Hezekiah. (Notes, 1 Kings xviii. xix. 2 Chr. xx. xxxii.)

V. 10. The "name" of God may, in this connection, either mean, the glorious perfections by which he was known to his people, and distinguished from all the idols of the heathen; or his title, as "the Lord of hosts," "the God of Abraham, and the God of Israel." (Marg. Ref.) In both respects, the powerful protection afforded his people, and the righteous vengeance executed, by his right hand on their insolent and impious invaders, would tend to make his praises celebrated, through the whole land, and indeed to the ends of the earth. (Note, 2 Kings xix. 16.)

V. 11. This verse is in the future tense, and may literally be rendered "Mount Zion will rejoice, and the daughters of Judah" (the other towns and cities dependent on Jerusalem,) "will be glad because of thy judgments," &c. as an anticipation, during the apparent danger, of victory and exulting praises, rather than as subsequent exhortation. (Notes, 2 Chr. xx. 12-25.)

V. 12, 13. The people are here called on, to go round the city in solemn procession; and, while they joyfully praised and blessed the Lord, to mark all the towers, walls, and palaces; observing that not one of them had been in the least injured by their formidable invaders. This would tend the more deeply to impress their minds; and prepare them, faithfully and diligently, to preserve the memory of these interesting events, for the benefit of future generations. Yet it seems not to have been necessary, to take this exact survey of Jerusalem's walls and fortifications, to be transmitted to posterity, had not these been types of more permanent privileges; and unless they were speedily to be demolished, that the things signified by them might remain for ever. (Note, Heb. xii. 26-29.)

V. 14. This verse, as the conclusion of a psalm, in which temporal deliverances, security, and privileges might appear to be exclusively celebrated, is a strong

PSALM XLIX.

The psalmist calls on all mankind to attend to his instructions, 1-4. He shows that the righteous need not fear in evil times, 5. He exposes the vanity of trusting in riches, 6-13. He contrasts the condition of the prosperous ungodly man, with that of the believer, especially in respect of death and the resurrection, 14-20.

intimation, that spiritual and eternal blessings were also meant. It was before said, that God would establish Jerusalem for ever: but it is here added, in the most emphatical language imaginable, "This God," who protects Jerusalem, "is our God," or the friend and patron of his true people; and this "for ever and ever," or "to all eternity." "He will be our guide unto death;" through all the sorrows and dangers of this world to the eternal blessings of heaven. (Notes, xxiii. 3, 4. lxxiii. 23-28. Heb. xi. 13-16.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The Lord is a great and glorious King, and worthy of universal and most exalted praises: but none on earth will render him this due honour, except the citizens of the spiritual Jerusalem, who worship him in the mountain of his holiness, as their God and Saviour. The beauty and glory of his church, which should be, and will evidently prove, "the joy of the whole earth," are derived from his presence and love, and are the reflection of his uncreated excellencies. Wherever there are princes or people who make God their refuge, he will be known among them as such: for he will never disappoint the expectation of any who hope in his word. But, when kings and nations, however numerous and potent, confederate against his church, sudden terror and destruction will be their portion. We have heard and read of the works of God for Israel of old; and in the establishment of the gospel upon the ruins of idolatry: and if we wait for his lovingkindness in his holy temple, by persevering faith and prayer, we shall experience, in our measure, the same powerful supports and deliverances: and still more glorious things shall at length be accomplished, in order to establish the church throughout the whole earth.—The Lord will always act consistently with those glorious perfections, which, by means of his word, are made known and celebrated to the ends of the earth: the salvation of his people will be accompanied with righteous vengeance on his enemies; but every true believer may rejoice because of his judgments.—Let us then diligently examine, and accurately mark, the security of the everlasting covenant, confirmed by the word and oath of the immutable God: let us consider that "his church is built upon a rock, against which the gates of hell shall not prevail;" and let us meditate upon his exceedingly great and precious promises, and the privileges enjoyed by every true believer. Whilst we are thus encouraged by them to trust and serve the Lord, in perilous and difficult circumstances; let us point them out to our children, and to the rising generation: for this almighty and gracious God is the portion and the shield of every true Christian, through successive generations, and to all eternity. He will guide us all, through life to death, and through death to glory; and in the city of our God above, we shall enjoy uninterrupted and unalloyed peace and felicity.

NOTES.

PSALM XLIX. Title. The author of this psalm is not known;—"But, whoever composed it, it is likely he had in his eye, the unreasonable thirst of mankind after riches, and their insolence when they have acquired them; which, it is possible, was a great discouragement to some pious but poor people in his time." And therefore he indited this psalm to check that vanity, by setting death before their eyes, &c. (Bp. Patrick.)—It is not improbable that David wrote the psalm, and gave it to the sons of Korah; though the title may mean, that it was written by some of the sons of Korah.

V. 1-4. The psalmist, in these verses, sublimely introduced his subject, by demanding an audience from the whole human race, to a message which he would deliver unto them from God; and his important and universally interesting instruction, being written in the sacred Scriptures, has already been proposed to innumerable multitudes, and will at length be heard by all the inhabitants of the earth, whether of noble or ignoble birth, whether rich or poor. (Notes, 1. 4-6. lxxviii. 1, 2. Deut. xxxii. 1, 2. Matt. xiii. 34, 35.) As the prophet of God, he had first inclined his ear to his Divine instructor; and finding the subject difficult, because of the corrupt prejudices, aversion, and ineptitude of the mind of man to spiritual things, and to require the closest attention, in order to a right understanding and explanation of it, he had carefully meditated on it before he spake; and then he had formed it into poetry, and set it to music, that sacred melody might be the vehicle of weighty instruction. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 5. The old translation seems to give the true sense of this verse;—"Wherefore should I fear in the evil days, when iniquity shall compass me about, as at mine heels." "What cause is there that I should be troubled with fears, and cares, and anxiety of mind, in calamitous times, when the iniquity of those who endeavour to supplant me hath surrounded me on all sides, and left me no way to escape them.' (Bp. Patrick.) In the judgment of the best critics, among whom Bishop Lowth is one, the word, rendered as a substantive, "my heels," is a participle, signifying "my supplanters." The purport of the question is plainly this: Why should I give way to fear and despondency in the times of calamity, when the wickedness of my wealthy and powerful adversaries compasses me about to supplant and overthrow me? (Bp. Horne.) —When the consequences of a man's sins overtake him, and he has no way to escape, he may well fear; but the believer has no occasion to fear the power or subtlety of his most malicious persecutors. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 6, 7. (Notes, lii. 6, 7. lxi. 8—10. Job xxxi. 24—28. Jer. ix. 23, 24. Mark x. 24. 1 Tim. vi. 17—19.)—A ransom. (7.) That is, an atonement, or expiation; for this is the literal meaning of the word. (Note, 1 Pet. i. 17—21.) They who glory and trust most in their riches, cannot, with all their wealth, satisfy divine justice, so as to ransom their nearest relative, or best beloved friend, from death, to which he is sentenced by the righteous governor of the world; much less can they deliver his soul from hell. (Note, Matt. xvi. 24—28. P. O. 21—28.)

V. 8. Precious. 'Rare, or not to be found, as prophecy was precious in the days of Eli.' (1 Sam. iii. 1.) The price of redemption, whether of the life or soul, was too high for any mere man to pay; so that the ancient fathers referred the verse to Christ, in this sense, 'No man can redeem his brother, he alone excepted, who is also God.' (Marg. Ref.)—'Even a Jewish interpreter understands these words of the king Messiah, who, having died for the redemption of his brethren, afterwards liveth for ever, as was predicted by Isaiah.' (Is. liii. 10. Bp. Horne.)

V. 9. 'As long as the world endureth, this will be a vain endeavour.—Let a man attempt it, if he will, upon himself. Can he prolong his own life, that it shall be perpetuated, and never dissolved?' (Bp. Patrick. Notes, Prov. x. 2, 3. Ec. viii. 8. Luke xvi. 22, 23.) And if this be a vain attempt, who can redeem or save his own immortal soul from the awful sentence of eternal punishment? —See corruption. (Note, xvi. 8—11.)

V. 10. Every man may see that the wise and learned of the world die in the same manner as the foolish and stupid, and they who have prospered in heaping up wealth, leave it all behind; perhaps to those for whom they never intended it, and who rejoice at their death. (Notes, xcii. 6, 7. Ec. ii. 12—23. v. 13—17. ix. 1—3. Luke xii. 15—21.)

V. 11. 'Various are the contrivances of vain men to have their names written on earth, and to procure, after death, an imaginary immortality for themselves and their families in the memory and conversation of posterity, which is not often obtained, and if obtained, is of no value; when, with less trouble, they might have secured to themselves a blessed immortality in the kingdom of the Redeemer.' (Bp. Horne. Notes, Gen. iv. 16, 17. xi. 1—4. 1 Sam. xv. 12. 2 Sam. xviii. 17, 18.)

V. 12. The word rendered "abideth," signifies to lodge all night. Man's continuance in the world resembles a traveller's lodging at an inn, whence he removes in the morning. So soon must wealth and honour be relinquished, and the most honourable men die like the beasts that perish, except as distinguished by an immortal soul, and a future state of righteous retribution. (Notes, 20. lxxiii. 18—22. Ec. iii. 18—21. ix. 4—6. Heb. ix. 27, 28.)

V. 13. Some render the first clause, "This their way is their confidence," meaning a rash and presumptuous confidence. 'Yet so close does this folly stick to mankind, that they that succeed in their possessions make no benefit of this observation; but are as very fools to themselves, and tread in the steps of those who went before them.' (Bp. Patrick.) Indeed, ungodly men from age to age not only copy their example, but imbibed the principles, and adopt the

PSALM L.

The mighty God comes in awful majesty from Zion, to judge his people, in the sight of the assembled world, 1—4. He commands that the saints be gathered to him; and declares that the heavens shall declare his righteousness, 5, 6. He delighteth not in legal sacrifices, but in spiritual worship, 7—15. Hypocrites are rebuked and silenced, 16—21. The ungodly are warned, and salvation is promised to the upright, 22, 23.

A Psalm of *Asaph.

THE mighty God, even the LORD, hath spoken, and called the earth from the rising of the sun unto the going down thereof.

2 Out of Zion, the perfection of beauty, God hath shined.

3 Our God shall come, and shall not keep silence: a fire shall devour before him, and it shall be very tempestuous round about him.

posed to us in his holy word; and had it not been for man's dislike to such subjects, they would have been universally heard and understood.—At the call of folly, what multitudes are always ready to assemble! But wisdom, eternal and essential wisdom, crieth without; she lifteth up her voice in the streets; and who is at leisure to attend her heavenly lectures? The mouth of Jesus always spake of wisdom, but few regarded him; the meditation of his heart was ever of understanding, but it was accounted madness. (Bp. Horne.)—We should, however, still endeavour to illustrate and enforce these important instructions by every method which can soften prejudice, or gain attention; especially by shewing their influence on our own hearts, in mortifying covetousness, ambition, envy, and discontent, and all selfish and sensual passions; in raising us above the fear of man, and rendering us constant and cheerful in doing the will and professing the truth of God amidst the successful enmity of persecutors, or oppressors.—How general, yet how absurd and infatuated, is it, for men to boast of their riches, and trust in them! to pursue them as the one thing needful, if they have a prospect of acquiring them, and to repine and murmur if they have not! Yet it is most evident that wealth can neither prolong the life, nor save the soul of the possessor, or his most beloved relative; and had not the ransom of the death of Christ intervened, the body of every sinner must have finally been left in the grave, and his soul in hell; for "the redemption was too precious" to be otherwise effected, and "must have been left alone for ever." And as we see that neither wealth nor worldly wisdom will exempt any man from dying, and that all such acquisitions must shortly be relinquished for ever, how vain are all our anxious cares and labours! What good will it do any man to have his name perpetuated on earth, when he hath no name in the registers of heaven? Thus foolish are the thoughts and ways of ungodly men. Yet one generation after another applauds their maxims; and the character of a fool, as drawn by heavenly Wisdom itself, continues the favourite model for imitation in the judgment of a vast majority even of professed Christians! (Note, Luke xii. 15—21.) Death alone can convince men in general of the folly of laying up treasures upon earth; and were there no future state, the most wealthy and honourable would soon be levelled with the beasts that perish; but in the prospect of the resurrection, and of eternity, the most prosperous of the wicked are infinitely more wretched and base. In this light let the believer view the riches and the children of this world, that he may not be tempted to envy or impatience, or to fear evil consequences to himself and to the church of God, when sinners grow rich and honourable. Soon will they die, and carry nothing away with them of all their splendour and magnificence. Though they foolishly congratulate themselves, and others applaud them, as having done well for themselves; yet they are going to "the generation of their fathers, and shall never see light;" "for, to them is reserved the blackness of darkness for ever." But the real Christian, when he dies, is for ever delivered from sin and sorrow; his soul is received to glory; his body shall be redeemed from the grave, and raised incorruptible and glorious. His inheritance is in heaven; and, in the resurrection, he will sit in judgment on those who here oppressed and persecuted him. (Notes, 1 Cor. v. 1—6. Rev. iii. 20—22.) And is there a rational creature that can prefer the lot of the rich sinner to that of poor Lazarus? (Notes, Luke xvi. 19—31.) and is this more than brutish stupidity universal to the human race, if left to themselves? What need, then, have we of revelation, and of the teaching of the Holy Spirit, when, with all our boasted powers, we are prone to such infatuation in the most important of all concerns! O Lord, deliver us from the love of the world, and teach us to set our affections on things above!

NOTES.

PSALM L. Title. "Hezekiah commanded the Levites to sing praises unto the LORD with the words of David, and of Asaph the seer." (2 Chr. xxix. 30.) Hence it appears that Asaph was a prophet, and wrote some psalms, and, probably, this among the rest. Some expositors, however, are of opinion, that "Asaph the seer" was a different person from Asaph the Levite, who was one of the chief singers in the days of David; (Marg. Ref.) that he lived at a later period; and that it is not unlikely he was contemporary with Hezekiah, and referred in this psalm to the hypocrisy of the Jews in general, even during Hezekiah's reformation. But, at whatever time the psalm was composed, the instructions contained in it are of general importance and utility.—It is a most sublime poem, which is generally supposed to predict the coming of Christ, the abolition of the Mosaic dispensation, and the introduction of Christianity; with the condemnation of the Jews, especially of the Scribes and Pharisees, for rejecting it. But the judgment executed upon Jerusalem prefigured the awful proceedings and consequences of the general judgment; and the Scribes and Pharisees are the parents of a numerous progeny of superstitious, formal, and hypocritical professors and teachers of Christianity, who will be condemned at that solemn day.

V. 1, 2. In the preceding psalm, all the inhabitants of the world were addressed in the name of God; (Note, xlix. 1—4;) but here the mighty God, (or "the God of gods," Note, Josh. xxii. 29,) JEHOVAH himself, is introduced with inexpressible solemnity; and all the inhabitants of the earth, as well as his people Israel, are summoned to attend. His august tribunal, however, is not placed on mount Sinai, whence he delivered his fiery law, but on mount Zion, where his glory was manifested above the mercy-seat, and the ark of the covenant, which prefigured his gracious gospel. Accordingly, Zion is here called "the perfection of beauty;" as reflecting the uncreated glory and excellency of JEHOVAH, who thence shines forth in the perfect harmony of all his divine attributes.—Indeed, the words, "perfection of beauty," may be referred to God himself, who appears in the gospel at once infinitely glorious, and infinitely lovely. (Notes, xxvii. 4—6. xc. 13—17. Cant. v. 10—16. 2 Cor. iii. 17, 18. iv. 5, 6.)—Shined. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 3. (Note, 16—21.) God is said to "keep silence," when he exercises long-suffering, and does not immediately punish men for their sins. (Notes, Is. xlii. 13, 14. lxxv. 3—7. Acts xiv. 11—18. xvii. 22—31.) Thus he long bore with the provocations and hypocrisy of Israel, as he still bears with the corruptions and abominations of professed Christians, and with the wickedness of mankind in general. But the time was approaching, when he would no longer keep silence, but would come to execute vengeance on the guilty; and though his tribunal would be placed in Zion, yet his coming would be attended with those terrible displays of majesty, justice, and holiness, with which the law was given from mount Sinai. (Marg. Ref.) Thus, when Christ came among the Jews, though in the character of a Saviour, they could not "abide the day of his coming;" and his righteous indignation, like unquenchable fire, burnt up the chaff; that is, he destroyed, by awful judgments, the bulk of the nation, which persisted in rejecting him. (Notes, Mal. iii. 1—6. iv. 1. Matt. iii. 7—12.) But his second coming to judge the world, to perfect the salvation of his people, and to punish the wicked, will be attended with still more tremendous displays of his power and justice, especially against such as neglect, oppose, or abuse his gospel. (Marg. Ref.)—The Jewish rabbies affirm the subject of this psalm to be, that judgment will be executed in the days of Messiah; ignorant, alas! that they themselves, and their people, are now become the unhappy objects of that judgment. (Bp. Horne.)

V. 4—6. All the inhabitants of heaven, as well as of earth, shall be summoned to witness the proceedings of their omnipotent Sovereign; and they will all concur in declaring, that his decisions are perfectly wise and righteous.—The whole human race, indeed, must appear in judgment; yet the professed worshippers of God, who have his oracles and ordinances among them, are chiefly spoken of in all the descriptions given us in Scripture of that solemn season: because these descriptions were especially given for their instruction, warning, or encouragement. (Notes, Matt. xxv. 31—36. Rom. ii. 7—17. 1 Cor. iv. 2—5. 2 Cor. v. 9—12. 2 Thes. i. 5—12. Rev. xx. 11—15.)—The "saints" may mean those who are really such, and who are interested in the new covenant, through the sacrifice of the great Redeemer. These were separated from among the unbelieving Jews, before vengeance was executed on the nation; and they will be gathered together by the holy angels previously to the condemnation of the wicked at the last judgment.—(Marg. Ref.) But some think that professed saints are meant, many of whom trusted to the national covenant with Israel, through the appointed sacrifices, and would at length be convicted of substituting a form, instead of the power, of godliness.—As "the Father judgeth no man, but hath committed all judgment to the Son," we cannot mistake the person of whom it is said, "for God is judge himself." (Notes, li. 16, 17. xcvi. 13. John v. 20—27.—Note, 3.)

V. 7—15. The Israelites in general confided and gloried in their relation to JEHOVAH as their God. And, indeed, they were peculiarly favoured by him, and were bound by every tie to worship and serve him only, and to expect their happiness from him. But this external profession, when insincere, could not secure them from his wrath; nay, "God, even their God," would speak and testify against them. They were also prone to place their chief dependence on legal sacrifices, without attending to their import, or offering them in a proper frame of mind; thus they mistook the shadow for the substance, and, at length, were condemned for that perverse mistake, when they persisted in rejecting the Messiah; for these sacrifices, when thus offered in unbelief, pride, and hypocrisy, were abominable to God; (Notes, Prov. xv. 8. xxi. 3. 27. Is. i. 11—15. lviii. 1—7. lxxvi. 3, 4. Jer. vii. 1—7. 21—23. Am. v. 21—24. Rom. ii. 17—29.) To lead their minds, therefore, to an attention to the more inward, and essential parts of religion, and to prepare them for a more spiritual dispensation; they were here informed that the Lord's controversy with them would not be about the omission of sacrifices, except as that arose from perverseness and rebellion. The time was approaching, when he would take no bullock, or he-goat, from them, requiring none but spiritual sacrifices. They could not, surely, be so gross as to suppose that he wanted their cattle; seeing he was the sole proprietor of all things; or imagine that he would "eat the flesh of bulls, or drink the blood of goats!" Such sacrifices, therefore, could not be acceptable to him, except as expressions of faith and love. On the other hand, an humble thankful heart, disposed to worship and praise God, (to "sacrifice to God thanksgiving," Note, Heb. xiii. 15, 16;) and to fulfil the engagements implied in the profession of being his people, as well as the vows made in the days of distress; and to confide in him, and seek help from him in trouble, by earnest prayer, were sacrifices suited to his holy nature. This spiritual worship, springing from a penitent believing heart, and connected with humble submission and obedience, was the grand substance of true religion, even under the Mosaic dispensation, and would be the substance of that which was about to succeed; and worshippers of this character would be accepted and delivered, and would render glory and praise to God for temporal mercies, and eternal salvation. (Marg. Ref.)—This passage was evidently intended as an intimation, that the ceremonial law would be abrogated at the coming of the Messiah; as well as an encouragement to prayer and praise.

V. 16—21. Multitudes of the strictest professors and teachers of the Jewish church were, not only superstitious and formal, (and so either blind guides or blindly led,) but even atrociously wicked; and yet they cloaked their crimes with apparent zeal. (Notes, Matt. xxiii. 14—33.) Thus in all ages many love the credit of being Christians, and the dignity of instructors, who "hate instruction;" and many discourse on the word of God with their lips, who pour contempt upon it in their lives. Whilst they zealously plead for some parts of divine truth; they secretly, nay, perhaps openly, indulge themselves in lewdness, dishonesty, and in wicked and deceitful conversation, and the basest slander and calumny, especially against those who are strictly conscientious, and such pious persons as, being near to them, put them to shame by their example. Indeed in this manner, they often excuse, and even think they have compensated for, their crimes, by their earnestness in promoting what they suppose to be the cause of God. But the righteous Judge disdains such hypocrites, and abhors their religious profession and preaching, even more than their theft, adultery, and lies: because they tend more to disgrace the gospel, and to prejudice or deceive the souls of men. "What have they to do to declare his statutes, or to take his covenant in their mouths?" His cause needs not such helpers; he never sent or employed them; and they must expect his vengeance as their recompense. Such were the scribes and chief priests, who were scrupulously zealous about externals, while they were full of rapine and covetousness; and were seeking to murder the holy Jesus, by bearing false witness against him before Pilate, in the most atrocious manner. The whole of this strange delusion arises from an abuse of God's long-suffering, and a wilful mistake of his character, and the intention of his gospel; as if the methods of his grace, the doctrines of his word, or the ordinances of his worship, were substituted in the stead of a holy life, and afforded men the license to indulge their lusts with impunity! But the Jews of old were reprov'd, convicted, condemned, and punished with the most dreadful severity, on these accounts: and so will all the superstitious, formal, hypocritical, enthusiastic, or antinomian abusers of the gospel; when the day of judgment shall come, and the secrets of men shall be judged by Jesus Christ. (Marg. Ref. Note, 3.)—Consentedst, &c. (18.) Or, "Hadst pleasure in him." (Note, Rom. i. 28—32. conclusion.)

V. 22, 23. The psalm concludes with warning all of every description, "who forget God," (which is the cause of every fatal error and daring crime,) to consider the account which they must give, and to "flee from the wrath to come;" for if the Almighty appeared as their enemy, no deliverer could possibly be found: with encouraging the upright to offer their humble tribute of grateful praise; with which God will be glorified, through the promised Redeemer, notwithstanding their deficiencies: and in a circumspect and conscientious conversation, to wait for a fuller discovery and experience of

God's salvation; or to look for the coming of their promised Saviour. (Note, 7—15.)—According to the concluding words of these verses, no man "ordereth his conversation or conduct aright," who trusts in his own works, and does not seek the salvation of God; none seeks that salvation properly, who is not conscientious in his whole conduct; and none, who unites the two, fails of salvation.—The Latin version is very striking: Him that 'disposes or regulates his conduct, I will cause to enjoy my salvation.' The preventing grace of God leads a man, like Cornelius, to regulate his conduct piously and uprightly, and to wait for God's salvation in this way; and the promise ensures to such a person the enjoyment of that salvation. (Notes, Acts x. 1—8, 34, 35.)—What a noble view does this psalm give, then, of God and of Revelation! God stands forth as the Parent, Lord, and Judge of all; exercising an universal providence, soliciting us to make him our refuge, to worship and serve him, promising us his reward and favour.—And in that very volume of Scripture which enjoins so many ceremonies, how little intrinsic value is there ascribed to them, compared with spiritual worship, and ordering the conversation aright!

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—15. The almighty and eternal JEHOVAH hath spoken to men from mount Sinai as a Lawgiver, and from mount Zion as a Saviour, and ere long he will speak to the whole human race from his righteous tribunal. This solemn season will be to sinners "the day of wrath, and of the revelation of the righteous judgment of God," whilst heaven and earth will approve the sentence denounced against them. But they, who have been favoured with the blessed gospel, in which the beauty and glory of all the Divine perfections "shine forth from the face of Jesus Christ," and who have neglected or abused it, will hear the most tremendous doom. Happy they, who are saints indeed! who have acceded to the covenant of grace, by faith in the Redeemer's atoning sacrifice, and who have shewn the sincerity of their love by the fruits of righteousness! these shall first be severed from among the wicked, and announced heirs of eternal life.—But let us beware of resting in any form: even divine truths and institutions may be held, and attended on, in unrighteousness; and God will testify against his own professed people, who trust to their outward privileges, and frequent his ordinances in pride, superstition, or self-righteousness. He demands the heart, and will not be put off with an unmeaning external observance: how then can human inventions please him, when repentance, faith, and holiness, are neglected?—We cannot offer unto God any thing, which he hath not bestowed upon us, or any thing that can profit him: so that the notion of meriting from him is replete with ignorance as well as arrogance. (Note, 1 Chr. xxix. 10—19. P. O. ibid.) As the Jews and their costly oblations were abhorred, when they rejected Him, of whom Moses and their prophets had written; so will attendance on the ordinances of Christianity, and even moral obedience, be rejected, if substituted in his place: and no spiritual services can be performed, except by faith in him, and by the supply of his Spirit. To be sensible of our own indigence, dependence, and unworthiness; to seek every thing from the all-sufficient God by faith and prayer; to render him the tribute of a thankful heart; to perform the vows implied in baptism and the Lord's supper; (Note, lvi. 12. P. O. last part;) and to call upon him in every time of trouble, as our only refuge and friend, are reasonable sacrifices, and suited to him, "who is a Spirit, and seeketh such to worship him as worship him in spirit and truth." (Note, John iv. 21—24.) They who thus worship, "glorify God;" and every answer to prayer, received with gratitude, forms an earnest of their eternal salvation.

V. 16—22. If ignorant formalists, though not grossly immoral or profane, are under a dangerous delusion, what will be the doom of those, who understand, profess, and preach the truths of God; attend on, and even administer, his ordinances, and speak of his everlasting covenant; whilst they hate instruction, despise his commandments, and are companions with thieves, adulterers, liars, slanderers, and false-swearers? Yet how many such professors, and teachers of Christianity, disgrace the present age! How many such scandals are found even among those who are zealous for the doctrines of grace! And how strangely are they connived at, and enabled to keep up their confidence, as if the Judge washings and purifications of the Mosaic law; and shews that the psalmist here fervently prayed to be cleansed from the pollution, as well as the guilt, of his sins; that he was aware no outward forms, or endeavours, of his own could effect this cleansing; and that he sought this blessing through the redemption and grace of the promised Saviour. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 3. (Notes, xxxii. 1—5.) While David endeavoured to cover his sins, (to conceal or excuse them,) he could not, sincerely and heartily, seek forgiveness from God, as an act of entirely unmerited mercy and grace. And this seems to have been his state of mind before Nathan came to him: but now “being come to himself,” he is deeply conscious of his most heinous guilt; and confesses it openly and ingenuously, with all its aggravations: nay, the remembrance of his complicated baseness seems to haunt him continually, and his conscience incessantly reproaches him: so that he can by no means exclude the most distressing reflections. Thus he “submits to God’s righteousness,” owns he deserves to perish, and is prepared, if spared, to ascribe the whole honour of salvation to the rich mercy and grace of God alone. (Notes, 2 Chr. xxxiii. 12, 13. Job xxxiii. 27—30. Jer. xxxi. 18—20. Luke xv. 17—21. 1 John i. 8—10.)

V. 4. ‘It is thy prohibition, O God, that can make a sin. I have sinned against thee, but it is thy law that I have violated, in that is my offence.’ (Bp. Hall.) ‘If thou shouldst pronounce the heaviest sentence upon me for my crimes, and execute it with the greatest severity, I could not accuse thee of too much rigour; but would still justify thee in thy proceedings, and clear thee from all such unjust imputations.’ (Bp. Patrick.)—David’s crimes had deeply injured Bathsheba, Uriah, Joab, and the other accessories to Uriah’s murder; the men slain with him, their families, and the nation; and they were likely to occasion most fatal consequences in various ways, to vast numbers: (Notes, 2 Sam. xi. 6—17. xii. 14.) yet the chief malignity of his conduct consisted in this; that it was a complication of most daring rebellions against the great and glorious Governor of the world; contempt of his majesty, excellency, and righteous law; a most ungrateful return for immense obligations; and an apostasy in heart from God, through idolatrous love of worldly pleasure. Indeed no words can express the heinousness and aggravations of his guilt in this view of it: and this view seems to have possessed and overwhelmed his mind to such a degree, as to make every other consideration appear comparatively as nothing. Even before the law was given, God himself stated that the grand malignity of murder consisted in its being an assault on man, whom he created in his own image. (Note, Gen. ix. 6.)—Crimes in civil society, which are injurious to individuals, are yet punished as violations of the laws of the land, done against the king and the peace of the realm; such are called ‘pleas of the crown,’ and high treason is the chief crime in every land. David indeed was not accountable for his conduct to any human tribunal: he had carefully concealed his transgressions from man; but he was sensible that the Lord had witnessed the whole, and would bring it to light: he therefore found himself constrained to plead guilty, to the most humiliating charges of guilt and depravity, brought against mankind in general, which were contained in the word of God; for he was convinced that his base conduct, after all his peculiar advantages and zealous profession of religion, would abundantly justify those declarations of the entire wickedness of the human heart, and fully confute the blasphemous censures, which ungodly men venture to pass upon the government of God, and upon his denunciations and judgments, as if unjust and severe. Thus, in every sense, the case of David, when well understood, is suited to justify God in all his declarations, and to vindicate his whole government from every aspersion. (Note, Rom. iii. 3, 4.)

V. 5, 6. David was the offspring of lawful and honourable marriage; nothing is intimated against his father Jesse in the sacred oracles, and he repeatedly speaks of his mother as “the handmaid of the Lord:” yet, having received from his parents Adam’s fallen nature, with all its evil propensities, he confesses that he was conceived and shapen in iniquity. His late dreadful fall evinced the depravity of his heart; and in these instances he had only acted according to its corrupt bias, being in himself naturally prone to rebellion against God. (Notes, lxxvi. 16. cxvi. 16. Marg. Ref.) This he confessed in deep humiliation; yet it by no means followed, that the Lord should relax in his requirements, because of the depraved propensities of his apostate creatures. His perfect law requires entire truth, purity, and love in the heart and conduct; and in this alone he delighteth; and sincerity from the inmost soul, in repentance, faith, and renewed obedience, is requisite even according to the gospel. This the psalmist had been taught, before his transgressions: “in the hidden part, of the Lord had made him to know wisdom,” which was a great aggravation of his guilt, in that he sinned against knowledge, conscience, and the peculiar obligations conferred on him. If we read the clause in the future tense, as in our translation, it expresses the psalmist’s hope and prayer, that the Lord would, notwithstanding his guilt and depravity, graciously and by his effectual inward teaching, communicate to him true wisdom, and enable him of the world were altogether such an one as themselves! Indeed, their present impunity emboldens them to expect, that they shall always escape. But the Judge will come, and will strip off their masks, and reprove, convict, and condemn them. He will set in order before them, and publish to the world, what they have done; he will say to each of them, ‘See what thou hast wrought!’ whilst the pages which record their crimes shall be read to their confusion; and they will be speechless, when sentenced “to depart into everlasting fire, prepared for the devil and his angels.” Let us then judge ourselves, and beware of hypocrisy; let ministers see to it, that they preach first to themselves, and love and practise their own instructions: let every one enquire, whether he be indeed “allowed of God to be put in trust with the gospel;” or whether he run without being sent. It is evident beyond all doubt, that God abhorreth and will never allow of, those, who presume to declare his truths, whilst they are living in the love and habitual practice of gross sin, and take pleasure in those that do; and then slander and revile their more pious brethren, because not of their party, and because their example puts them to shame. If any have hitherto been thus forgetful of God, or given up to wickedness, let them consider their urgent danger: for if the Judge appear against them, who then can rescue them from his almighty indignation? He now warns, that he may not punish: let us then thankfully embrace his gospel, and praise him for his mercy; and, endeavouring to glorify him in word and deed, wait for his complete and eternal salvation.

NOTES.

PSALM LI. Title. (Notes, 2 Sam. xi. xii.) When Nathan had delivered his message, we may suppose that David retired to his chamber full of confusion, remorse, and anguish; and there poured forth his soul before God in unreserved confessions and fervent prayers. And, considering his rank, his age, and a variety of circumstances, relating to his family, to persons disaffected to his government, and to his character among the surrounding nations; it might have been thought expedient for him to have been satisfied with these secret acts of contrition and devotion; with humbling himself before God by fasting and prayer; and with “bringing forth fruits meet for repentance;” especially as God had already remitted the sentence of temporal death, to which the law condemned him. (Note, 2 Sam. xii. 13.) But he viewed the subject in another light, when brought to reflect seriously on his conduct, and its probable consequences. The honour of God and of true religion was deeply concerned, and with it the best interests of vast multitudes: nor did there appear any other way, in which the bad effects of his crimes could be so thoroughly prevented, as by his publicly taking the deepest shame to himself, for having acted directly contrary to that holy religion which he professed. Whatever might be the consequences to himself and his reputation, (zeal for the glory of God and love to his people having now revived, and gained the ascendancy in his heart, united with deep self-abhorrence, and a kind of indignation against himself;) he seems to have resolved without delay, to publish to his family, his subjects, the world at large, and all future generations, the judgment which, in the sight of God, he now entertained of his late behaviour, in the substance of his secret confessions and supplications; and the way in which, with deep anguish and distress, he sought forgiveness and salvation.—He therefore not only composed this psalm for his private use, or to shew his friends, or leave among his writings; but he gave it to the chief musician, that it might form a part of the public psalmody at the tabernacle, and in consequence be circulated through all the land, and among other nations; and continue in the church, with his other sacred poems, for the instruction and warning of mankind in all future ages. Nothing, all circumstances considered, can be conceived more humiliating than such a measure; nothing could more decidedly shew how much he preferred the honour of God to his own credit; in short, nothing could more decidedly manifest the depth of genuine repentance. (Note, 1 Sam. xv. 30, 31.)

V. 1, 2. The “mercy” of God, his “lovingkindness,” his “tender mercies,” “the multitude of his tender mercies,” form the only plea, which the royal penitent admits, in seeking forgiveness of his heinous crimes. He does not once mention his former services in the cause of religion; or palliate his conduct, by the peculiar temptations of his high rank, and the customs of princes; or plead that he was inadvertently betrayed into it, and led on by imperceptible degrees, step by step. (Notes, 1 Sam. xv. 15, 24. Prov. xxviii. 13. Luke xv. 17—19.) but, as a vile and miserable sinner, with many repetitions and an accumulation of words, energetically expressing his inmost thoughts and feelings, he dwells on the only cheering thought his case allowed of; and intreats, that God would, “to the praise of the glory of his grace,” forgive his sins; as a debt which is remitted is blotted out. (Notes, 9. Is. xlii. 22—25. xlv. 22. Eph. i. 3—8. Col. ii. 13—15.) And, as the stain was beyond expression deep, that he would thoroughly wash and cleanse it all away. (Notes, 7. Is. i. 16—20. Ez. xxxvi. 25, 26. Zech. xiii. 1. John xlii. 6—11. 1 Cor. vi. 7—9. Tit. ii. 4—7. Rev. i. 4—6. vii. 13—17.) The language is taken from the

to know and do what he required and delighted in.—'I am so far from representing my innate propensity to evil, as an excuse for what I have done; that I confess the consideration of it ought to have made me the more watchful and diligent, to suppress those bad inclinations, which I knew to be so natural.—I am amazed at my folly, that I should be so careless; when I know that thou requirest us, not to entertain, with the least kindness, those first emotions which we find in our thoughts and desires after any evil, but uprightly to oppose them.' (Bp. Patrick. Notes, Jam. i. 13-18.)

V. 7. The hyssop, employed in sprinkling the blood of the sacrifices, (as it is generally thought;) in the leper's offerings when cleansed; and in sprinkling the water of purification, represented the efficacy of faith, in applying to the soul the blood of Christ for pardon, and the influences of the Holy Spirit for sanctification. (Notes, Ez. xii. 3-10. 22, 23. xxiv. 6-8. Lev. xiv. 4-7. Num. xix. 17-21. Ez. xxxvi. 25-27. Heb. ix. 18-23.) Thus David prayed to be completely cleansed from all sin, both as to its guilt and pollution, that he might be as if he had never sinned; and thus believers will at length be made equal to the angels, who are arrayed in spotless robes of innocence, whiter than the snow itself. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 8. A man, who has carelessly fallen from a precipice, and broken his bones, when he comes to himself will feel exquisite torture, and be utterly disabled for the present; and probably will be reminded of his fall as long as he lives. Thus David had, through unwatchfulness, been induced to commit the most heinous wickedness; and though by the abundant mercy of God, he was preserved from that final destruction which he had justly merited; yet he experienced such anguish of conscience, and such a sense of the Divine displeasure, and met with such severe rebukes from the Lord, that he felt as if all his bones had been broken: he was full of pain; he was crippled and disabled from his former employments. He hoped, however, that "the God of salvation" would restore his peace and comfort; and thus set his broken bones, and cause them to rejoice. (Notes, xxxviii. 4-10. Hos. vi. 1, 2. Is. lxi. 1-3.)

V. 9. (Note, 1, 2.) 'The soul, still restless and uneasy, reiterates her request, that God would not only cease to behold her iniquity for the present, as a man who turneth away his face from a writing; but that he would not behold it any more, as a man who blotteth out what is written, so that it can never be read again.' (Bp. Horne. Marg. Ref.)

V. 10. The production of a holy disposition in a sinner's heart, the forming him to a spiritual judgment and taste, a submissive will, a pure imagination, and well-regulated affections, is a "new creation;" even as if Satan, by almighty power, should again be made a holy angel. This state of the understanding and heart is "a right spirit;" it is reasonable and excellent, such as all intelligent beings should possess, and it is absolutely necessary to true liberty and felicity. Man originally possessed it, but it was lost by the fall; and where it is again produced, it is the "renewal of a right spirit." This is begun in regeneration, and carried on by progressive sanctification, and completed in glory. When the sinner feels such a change to be necessary, and that he is unable to work it in himself, and when he reads the promises of God to this purpose, (Ez. xi. 17-20. xviii. 30-32. xxxvi. 25-27,) he asks it from God; and every discovery of remaining sinfulness leads the believer to renew this supplication; and thus the change is gradually effected, till it be finally completed.—The margin, however, more exactly from the original, renders it, "constant." "Renew a constant, or an established, spirit within me." Holy angels are established in a right spirit; and so are "the spirits of just men made perfect." Even on earth real Christians have, in a measure, this constant established spirit; but hypocrites are unstable.—David had experienced the inconstancy of his heart, and was sensible that, even if pardoned and restored, he should, in case he were left to himself, be again drawn aside; and prayed earnestly for that constancy, which might enable him, "with purpose of heart to cleave unto the Lord." (Notes, 12, 13. Num. xiv. 24. Josh. xvi. 6-15. Acts xi. 23, 24. 1 Cor. xv. 55-58. Jam. i. 5-8.)

V. 11. Eternal banishment from the gracious presence of God, under his wrath and curse, constitutes a principal part of the misery of hell; (Note, Matt. xxv. 41-46. P.O. 41-46;) and something like this misery may be felt on earth, even by the believer, when, excluded from comfortable communion with God, he finds his heart oppressed with the sense or dread of deserved wrath. This heaviest of all afflictions David deprecated.—The Spirit of God departed from Saul, when he was rejected from being king, and an evil spirit from God troubled him; (Note, 1 Sam. xvi. 14;) and David feared the same sentence, for his more atrocious crimes; as, in some respects, they certainly were. All his sufficiency, as the prophet of God, as his anointed king, and as the psalmist of Israel, was derived from the Holy Spirit; and all his comfort and usefulness must terminate, if the Holy Spirit should be finally taken from him. It is, indeed, on scriptural ground, as I suppose, maintained, that the Spirit of life and sanctification is never finally taken from believers; but, even in this case, their comforts may expire in despondings, their credit in disgrace, and all their gifts and usefulness may wither and be lost to the end of life; and they cannot, in such circumstances, distinguish themselves from hypocrites.

V. 12, 13. "The joy of God's salvation," arises from a persuasion and perception of the mercy and grace of God, according to his promises; of the nature and glory of his salvation, as revealed in the Scriptures; of its suitability to the sinner's wants, its freeness, and sufficiency; from a prevailing confidence of an interest in it; and from communion with God, and the exercise of faith, hope, admiring, adoring, grateful love, and all other holy affections, as springing from the Spirit of sanctification. The raptures and ecstasies peculiar to the prophets were of a very different nature, and arose from the sublime discoveries made to them, in dreams or visions, and they did not always imply holiness of heart; whereas "the joy of salvation" is the common privilege of the regenerate, according to the degree of their grace; and it belongs to no one else.

(Marg. Ref.) This joy David had experienced, and he had lost it by sin; that loss he regrets, and he earnestly prays for the restoration of his joy: for it cannot subsist, unless the conscience be kept tender, the heart watchful and spiritual, and the will submissive; and unless communion with God be maintained, and the Holy Spirit not grieved by gross misconduct.—But the royal penitent likewise feared, that even should he recover this holy joy, he should again lose it, if left to himself; and, therefore, he earnestly prayed that God would "uphold him with his free Spirit." The Holy Spirit may be thus called, because he is freely bestowed on sinners, through the gracious Saviour; but this epithet seems rather to mean, that the sanctifying Spirit sets the soul at liberty from sin and Satan, produces a noble, ingenuous, and liberal disposition, and teaches us to serve and worship God, as children, and not as slaves. (Notes, Rom. viii. 1, 2. 14-17. 2 Cor. iii. 17, 18. Gal. iii. 4-7. 2 Tim. i. 6-8.) Thus comforted and upheld, David purposed to teach sinners the ways of God, of peace, and holiness; and by using his influence for this purpose, and warning and encouraging them by his experience, he trusted that he should lead many to "repent and turn to God, and do works meet for repentance." (Notes, xxxii. 6, 7. Mark v. 14-20. Luke xxii. 31-34. 1 John i. 1-3.)

V. 14. The guilt of murder, as it were, haunted David's mind, and he was still praying for the removal of it from his conscience. And if he might but obtain this blessing from "the God of his salvation," though dreadful judgments had been denounced against him, and his family, for his crimes, he yet engaged to be open in vindicating the justice of God in these dispensations, even if connected with his own deep disgrace.—Many expositors, indeed, explain the words to mean, that he would celebrate that righteousness by which sinners, who believe, are accounted righteous before God, or the faithfulness of God to his promises; but the former meaning is more satisfactory.

V. 15. Conscious guilt had stopped David's mouth, when he attempted, as formerly, to shew forth the praises of God, or to plead his cause; but he trusted that the comforts of his pardoning love, and the returning influences of his Holy Spirit, would open his mouth, and give him confidence and liberty on these favourite topics. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 16. Murder and adultery were, by the law, punishable by death; and therefore no sacrifices were appointed to be offered by those who were guilty of them. The Lord would not accept, and did not desire, any sacrifices in David's case; and, indeed, he had no delight in sacrifices and burnt-offerings for their own sake, but merely as shadows of the true atonement, and expressions of a penitent, believing, thankful heart. (Notes, xl. 6-8. 1. 7-15.)

V. 17. The legal sacrifices were continued, above a thousand years, after this time, as types of the Redeemer's atoning sacrifice; nor can a broken heart do ought towards meriting forgiveness. But an humble spirit, broken off from all self-dependence, and the love of sin, and crushed down into deep self-abasement and abhorrence, is a spiritual sacrifice pleasing and honourable to God;

PSALM LII.

David contrasts the deceit and malice of Doeg, with the goodness of God, 1-4. He predicts Doeg's ruin, and the joy of the righteous, 5-7. He professes confidence in God, and a full persuasion that he shall praise him for ever, 8, 9.

To the chief Musician, Maschil, A Psalm of David, when <sup>a</sup>Doeg the Edomite came and <sup>b</sup>told Saul, and said unto him, David is come to the house of Ahimelech.

3 Thou <sup>a</sup>lovest evil more than good; and <sup>b</sup>'lying rather than to speak righteousness. Selah.

4 Thou lovest all <sup>a</sup>'devouring words, <sup>c</sup>'O thou deceitful tongue.

Prov. xii. 18. xviii. 21. i. cix. 2. cxx. 2. <sup>a</sup>Cor. iv. 2. xi. 13. k Jer. iv. 22. m I Sam. xxii. 18, 19. i. 25. 2 Tim. iii. 4. 1 xxi. 4. Jer. ix. 3-5. 8. John viii. 44. Rev. xxii. 18. m I Sam. xxii. 18, 19. Jam. iii. 6-9. * Or, and the deceitful tongue.

For, he who is unable to present this oblation, unreservedly submits to the justice of God; casts himself, without plea or excuse, upon his free mercy; thankfully accepts of his salvation, and will walk according to it, in all humble obedience, and patient submission to the will of God. This broken and contrite spirit man despises, as mean and contemptible; and the possessor is apt to deem it unmeet to be presented to his offended Sovereign: but God will never despise or reject such an unequivocal effect of his own renewing grace. (Notes, xxxiv. 18. 2 Kings xxii. 15-20. Is. lvii. 15, 16. lvi. 1, 2. Ez. ix. 3, 4. Matt. v. 3.)

V. 18, 19. David feared lest his guilt should render him an Achan in the congregation of Israel; (Notes, Josh. vii. xxii. 20;) and, therefore, he concluded his penitential prayer, with intreating God to protect and prosper Zion, that the ordinances of his house might be administered to his glory, and the edification of his people. For though the Lord delighted not in burnt-offerings for their own sake, yet, as they were typical of the Messiah's atonement, as they subverted the interests of true piety, and as they were accompanied by other sacrifices of righteousness, he was pleased with them.—'Thus it ought to be the fervent prayer of every man, especially in any exalted station, that no sins by him committed may any ways prejudice others, or obstruct the edification of the church.' (Bp. Horne. Marg. Ref.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1-4. If the most eminent believer ceases to watch and pray, Satan may obtain such advantages against him, that for the time he shall seem perfectly fascinated and stupified; but the Lord will at length, by rebukes or corrections, bring him to himself; and the depth of his humiliation will be proportioned to the heinousness of his sins. But the hypocrite is durably callous; and his religious profession, and opinions, are perversely employed, in excusing his crimes, and buoying up his presumptuous confidence.—The true penitent, even if before his fall he had been eminently holy and useful, has nothing to plead, except his own misery and the Lord's abundant mercy. For the more we are enabled to do in his service, the greater are our obligations: (Note, 1 Chr. xxix. 10-19;) and our sins are the more aggravated, when committed against knowledge, mercies, and vows; when they do violence to the new nature, and the strivings of the Holy Spirit; and when they are inconsistent with our character and profession, and tend to dishonour the gospel, and mislead our brethren.—The real penitent will be deeply humbled and afflicted; but he will not sink into despair; and in proportion as he renounces every false confidence, the more earnestly will he call upon God to "have mercy on him, according to the multitude of his tender mercies." He longs to have the whole debt of his sins cancelled, and every stain cleansed. He would be "thoroughly washed from his iniquities," till all his guilt and defilement be completely removed: but the hypocrite always has some secret reserves, and would spare some favourite lust.—Whilst sinners conceal or palliate their sins, they are out of the way of mercy: but when they, humbly and ingenuously, plead guilty, and unreservedly confess their crimes; they may even plead that confession, as a reason why they should be spared: for this yields the point in contest; namely, that the Lord might justly punish, and that salvation must be all of grace.—When a load of guilt oppresses a man of a tender conscience; the recollection of his sins, and their aggravations, follows him into company and into retirement; it occurs to his mind in scenes of business and of pleasure, and even breaks his rest, and disquiets his dreams; so that "his sin is ever before him:" but slight convictions, where the heart is not broken, are soon shaken off; and the wound is skinned over, but not healed.—The true penitent considers every sin as rebellion against the authority and infinite majesty of Heaven. If he has been preserved from those crimes, which evidently injure society, he reflects with shame upon the enmity and ingratitude of his heart against God, which have been manifested in his general conduct; and on this account he thinks himself a chief sinner: but if guilty of grosser transgressions, he considers his rebellion against God in them far more enormous than any injury, which he has done to men like himself. He is also ashamed of the folly of bestowing pains to hide these actions from men, which are done in the sight of his Lord and Judge; he pleads the cause of God against himself, and pleads guilty to the most humiliating charge in his word, as true in his own case: whilst they, who excuse themselves, commonly venture to arraign and censure the decisions and proceedings of the Almighty.

V. 5-13. When the heart is deeply humbled, on the recollection of heinous transgressions, the penitent is led to trace back the streams of actual sin to the fountain of original depravity, not to cavil or object, with the infidel or the hypocrite, but for his own deeper humiliation: he compares the propensities of his heart, as well as his outward conduct, with the holy law and glorious perfections of God; and, perceiving the contrariety, "abhors himself, and repents in dust and ashes." When he meditates on that "truth in the inward parts," in which the Lord delighteth, and that wisdom which he teacheth; and considers how contrarily he hath often acted to both; he is ashamed of his temper and conduct, and is led the more entirely to expect every thing good, from the influence of divine grace overcoming the tendency of corrupt nature. In short, he feels his need of pardon and of holiness; he longs for peace of conscience, and purity of heart; and his experience of his own utter inability to obtain them for himself, puts vigour into his prayers to the Lord, to purge him by the blood and Spirit of Christ, "that he may be clean; to wash him, that he may be whiter than snow;" "to cause him to hear of joy and gladness, that his troubled spirit may rejoice;" and, having pardoned all his sins by almighty power, "to create in him a clean heart, and renew a right spirit within him," that for the future he may hate and flee from all sin. He longs for this renewal to holiness as much as for "the joy of salvation;" and to be upheld from falling, equally with "the light of God's countenance," and the consolations of his Holy Spirit.—Nothing so animates the soul to teach the ways of God to sinners, and to seek for their conversion, as a deep experience of the bitterness of sin, and of the freedom and pleasantness of the pardoning love of God: they therefore always form the most zealous preachers to others, who have themselves been most deeply humbled; and they are most earnest for the salvation of their fellow-sinners, who most value and rejoice in the salvation of God themselves.

V. 14-19. When the heart is humbled, and the conscience tender, renewed recollection of heinous transgressions again and again discourages the soul: but this excites more fervent prayers, and when mercy is bestowed, by "the God of salvation," such penitents will most abound in thankful praises. Yet, conscious guilt stops the mouth, and the humbled sinner is afraid, or ashamed, to speak of his God, as in times past, until the impediment be removed by some tokens of pardoning love, and the comforts of the Holy Spirit. Such an one would do any thing, or part with any thing, to obtain pardon and peace: (Note, Mic. vi. 6-8;) but human inventions are worthless; and even divine ordinances are no more than means of communicating the blessings, procured by the sacrifice of Christ; and which can only be received by a broken and contrite heart, with which God is well pleased.—No personal fears or troubles of conscience can render the gracious soul forgetful of the interests of the church, or indifferent about them: the humble believer and faithful minister often fear, lest their own misconduct should blast their endeavours for doing good: and, whatever they suffer, or whatever become of them, they still desire and pray, that true religion may prevail, and that spiritual sacrifices may abound through Jesus Christ, to the praise and glory of God.—'O Lord, give us true repentance, for thy mercies' sake; help us to offer the sacrifice of a contrite spirit; preserve us from hypocrisy and blood-guiltiness, especially that of occasioning the ruin of immortal souls by our example or neglect; and enable us, through the merits and mediation of thy Son Jesus Christ, to walk with increasing watchfulness, and to pray more fervently for our fellow-Christians and fellow-sinners.'

NOTES.

PSALM LII. Title. (Notes, 1 Sam. xxii. 6-19.) V. 1. Doeg is here represented as boasting of his successful treachery, and savage cruelty, in murdering a multitude of unarmed and unresisting priests, and of women and children, as if he had performed some great exploit: and perhaps he menaced David and his company with the same vengeance. But the psalmist, by contrasting Doeg's malice and mischief with the persevering goodness of God, sharply reproved him; and, in fact, relying on the faithful and merciful promises of God, he set him, and all his other enemies, at defiance.

V. 2. Doeg appeared before Ahimelech with the semblance of piety; yet treacherously became his accuser and murderer. (Notes, 1 Sam. xxi. 7.) This unsuspected malice and cruelty were like a mortal blow given with a well-set razor, so as scarcely to be felt, at the moment when given. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 3, 4. It appears that Doeg not only sought the favour of Saul, but entered cordially into the detestable service required of him. His heart, being at enmity against God, hated his priests and servants, because he had a rooted aversion to piety and holiness. He loved evil, lying, and mischief, and gave them a decided preference to goodness, righteousness, and truth: for he took pleasure in gratifying his malignity and impiety, even as others did in gratifying avarice or sensual lusts. Nor was this all: for he loved and preferred in

PSALM LIV.

David complains of his enemies, and prays for deliverance, 1—3. He glories in the help of God, predicts ruin to his foes, and vows sacrifices and praises, 4—7.

To the chief Musician on Neginoth, Maschil, A Psalm of David, <sup>a</sup>when the Ziphims came and said to Saul, Doth not David hide himself with us?

<sup>2</sup>Hear my prayer, O God; give ear to the words of my mouth.

others, the same hateful dispositions, in which he indulged himself; and by calumny and lies prepared the way for persecution and murder. Thus he resembled, and was in some respects a type of, those who saw and hated the holy Jesus, because they hated the Father that sent him; and accomplished his death by lying witnesses and virulent accusations. (Notes, Matt. xxvi. 57—62. John viii. 41—47. xv. 22—25. xvi. 1—3. 2 Thes. ii. 8—12. Jam. iii. 3—6.)

V. 5. An accumulation of most expressive metaphors is here used, to mark the certainty of that dreadful and eternal punishment, which awaited this prosperous and haughty persecutor; and which awaits all who bear the same character, however in other respects distinguished.

V. 6, 7. The righteous, beholding the ruin of this vile transgressor, would reverence the Divine justice, become more afraid of sin, and be confirmed in true religion; yet, they would exult in beholding condign vengeance executed upon one, who was become so execrable and terrible by his crimes; and express cordial satisfaction in observing the event of a man's trusting in wealth and prosperity, encouraging himself in wickedness, renouncing God, and setting him at defiance. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 8. A green, &c. The olive-tree produces the oil, which is useful to man, and was employed in the worship of God. (Note, Judg. ix. 8—15.) Thus David, being rooted in love to the ordinances of God, would abide and be fruitful in his house; whilst Doeg, to whom was detained before the Lord, became a firebrand to destroy others and himself. (Notes, xiii. 5, 6. xcii. 12—15. cxlvii. 11, 12. Rom. xi. 16—22.)

V. 9. The psalmist praised God, as if his prediction had already been fulfilled; and he determined to wait still on his name.—The Name of God is glorious and excellent, in the judgment of “all his saints:” and they all deem it right, reasonable, honourable, and profitable, to wait patiently his time, in his ways, for the performance of his promises. (Marg. Ref.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

It is far worse to glory in, than to perpetrate, wickedness: yet many mighty men have been ambitious of being distinguished, by doing extensive mischief with valour, or crafty policy. Indeed, poets, orators, and historians have generally celebrated those as heroes, whose conduct has been the reverse of the Divine goodness, and the very counterpart of Satan's malice, pride, deceit, and murder; who have abused superior advantages and endowments, to devise and execute plans of more extensive devastation; or, who by slanders and treachery excite war and bloodshed, among those who were at peace.—The words of a deceitful tongue are often, not only as a sharp razor, but more devouring than the sword; and numbers in all ages have loved evil more than good: (Marg. Ref.) and lies more than truth, equity, and love. But it is wonderful that any man should value himself for being able to do mischief, when God esteemeth it his glory to do good: and his goodness will increase the condemnation of all those, who are emboldened by it in committing iniquity: but it forms the security of those who depend on it, and copy it as their example.—The believer foresees that God will cast down, sweep away, eradicate, and extirpate from the earth, and destroy for ever in hell, those who do not make him their strength, but idolize their wealth and prosperity, and who encourage themselves in wickedness: and no criminals will perish with greater exultation to the righteous, than hardened persecutors. Their success is like the luxuriant growth of some poisonous plant, which it is a public service to destroy. But the righteous man is a fruitful olive-tree, planted in a good soil: he trusts in the everlasting mercy of God, and delights in his ordinances; and, however he may be now afflicted, (and thus conformed to the suffering Redeemer,) he will wait on the name of the Lord, and will praise him for ever. In expectation of this felicity, let us begin the work of heaven on earth; praying continually that we may only witness, but never share, the perdition of the ungodly.

NOTES.

PSALM LIII. Title. This psalm differs very little from the fourteenth; and it is not known, nor has it been conjectured with much probability, on what account, or for what reason, the same sentiments are repeated in almost the same words. The variations, however, are sufficient to show, that the psalm in one place was intentionally altered from that in the other: and it is probable, from some change in the psalmist's circumstances, or some events which had occurred subsequent to its first publication.—The word Mahalah seems to denote a hollow instrument of music, a flute or pipe: and Maschil, or instrueting, implies the scope of it, viz.: an instruction or warning against impiety towards God, and rebellion against his anointed king.

V. 1—4. (Note, xiv. 1—3.) The only variations in these verses are the change, in several instances, of one word for another of nearly the same import.—Understand. (2.) Maschil, Title, Causing to understand; that is, ‘applying his heart to understanding.’ (Notes, 1. 16—21. 1 Chr. xxviii. 9. Prov. i. 7. ii. 1—6. John iii. 19—21. Rom. i. 28—32.) ‘Are not the workers of iniquity conscious, that they eat up my people, &c.’ Thus the fourth verse is rendered in some versions.

V. 5. This verse contains much more than the fifth verse in the fourteenth psalm; while the sixth is wholly omitted. (Note, xiv. 4—6.)—The rebels who rose up against David's authority, chiefly because they hated his religion, and were instigated by the spirit of persecution, proved on trial very cowardly; for no doubt God was pleased to impress terror on their hearts, when there was no adequate danger. (Notes, Judg. vii. 16—22. 1 Sam. xiv. 11—15. 2 Kings vii. 6, 7. Prov. xxviii. 1.) Thus the army of Absalom, which encamped against David, was easily routed; numbers fell in the forests; and, being left unburi, their bones were scattered: and because God despised the impotent rage of this abandoned party, his servant easily put them to confusion. (2 Sam. xviii. 5—8.)—They were a sort of type of the Jewish persecutors of Christ and his disciples.

V. 6. (Note, xiv. 7.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The folly of sinners greatly appears in their acting, as if they could escape the notice of Omniscience, prosper in defiance of Omnipotence, or be happy in rebellion against the source of all felicity.—They who go back from a religious profession generally become most filthy, or most malicious persecutors, who of all other sinners are most infatuated: for God hath despised, and will confound and destroy them; as he hath often scattered the bones of powerful armies, who have encamped against his church.—A guilty conscience and a dread of vengeance frequently fill the enemies of God with fears, where nothing formidable can be perceived; but at length their worst terrors will be awfully realized: (Note, Prov. x. 24.) and as the deliverance and prosperity of the church on earth will be attended with the ruin of all anti-christian opposers; so the eternal joys of the redeemed will be attended with the everlasting shame and misery of all their impenitent oppressors. (Note, Rev. xix. 17—21.)

NOTES.

PSALM LIV. Title. This psalm seems to contain the prayer, and confident expectation, of David, in the extremity of danger; when the Ziphites led Saul and his army to the very spot, where David and his small company lay concealed; and when, surrounded on every side by bloodthirsty deceitful foes, nothing but an extraordinary divine interposition could possibly preserve him. Viewed in this light, and compared with the event, it appears peculiarly interesting; and shews that the psalmist's confidence in God and fervency in prayer, increased in proportion to the emergency. (Notes, 1 Sam. xxiii. 21—28. xxvi. 1—4.)

V. 1. The honour of God, and of his holy name, was deeply concerned in David's preservation; as the Lord had expressly engaged to give him the kingdom. And as the omnipotent Judge of all could not want power, to defend his servant from the cruelty and iniquity of Saul and his party, and thus to vindicate his own glory; the psalmist in assured faith appealed to his righteous decision, and applied for his effectual protection. (Notes, vii. 8—11. xxvi. 1. 1 Sam. xxiv. 8—15.) His argument resembles that of Joshua.—“O Lord, what shall I say, when Israel turneth their backs on their enemies? For the Canaanites shall cut off our name from the earth; and what wilt thou do unto thy great name?” (Notes, Josh. vii. 6—9. Marg. Ref.)

V. 2, 3. (Marg. Ref.) The Ziphites belonged to the same tribe with David; yet they acted as strangers: and Saul, the Lord's anointed king, and his party, were become most cruel and bloodthirsty tyrants: for they had “not set God before them.” Selah. Let that be noted. (Notes, iii. 1, 2. xxxvi. 1.)

4 Behold, <sup>a</sup>God is mine helper: the LORD is with them that uphold my soul.

5 He shall <sup>a</sup>reward evil unto <sup>a</sup>mine enemies: 'cut them off in thy truth.

7 For <sup>a</sup>he hath delivered me out of all trouble: and <sup>a</sup>mine eye hath seen his desire upon mine enemies.

PSALM LV.

David <sup>a</sup>prays in great distress and terror. 1-8. He describes the wickedness and predicts the ruin of his enemies, 9-15. He determines to continue in prayer; and, confiding in God to deliver him and confound his foes, he exhorts others to trust in God. 16-23.

<sup>b</sup>GIVE ear to my prayer, O God; and <sup>a</sup>hide not thyself from my supplication.

2 Attend unto me, and hear me: <sup>a</sup>I mourn in my complaint, and make a noise;

3 Because of the voice of the enemy, because of <sup>a</sup>the oppression of the wicked: <sup>a</sup>for they cast iniquity upon me, and in wrath they hate me.

4 <sup>a</sup>My heart is sore pained within me; and <sup>a</sup>the tears of death are fallen upon me.

5 <sup>a</sup>Fearfulness and trembling are come upon me, and <sup>a</sup>horror hath <sup>a</sup>overwhelmed me.

6 And I said, <sup>a</sup>'Oh that I had wings like a dove! <sup>a</sup>for then would I fly away, and be at rest.

was become so weary of the treachery and ingratitude of men, and of the cares and disappointments of his high station; that he longed to have done with society, and to hide himself in some desert from the fury and fickleness of his people. He wished, in his haste, for the wings of the harmless dove, that he might "fly away and be at rest;" and his varied expressions, and the representation of the popular commotion as a violent tempest, show the vehement agitation of his mind. (Note, cxvi. 10, 11.) Yet in his more collected moments he could not approve of such a wish; he was not at liberty to leave his useful station; he could find no rest any where but in God, with whom he might commune in the midst of society; and he must wait for his more perfect rest, till he had fully served his generation.—These words describe the state of David's mind, when he went over the brook Cedron, and up Mount Olivet, "weeping as he went," and expecting speedy to be cut off: they "describe the agony of the Son of David, when he likewise went over the same brook Cedron, at the time of his passion, when his soul was sore amazed, and very heavy," "and exceeding sorrowful, even unto death." (Bp. Horne.) It may be added, that at that awful crisis the Saviour also prayed, "If it be possible, let this cup pass from me; nevertheless, not my will but thy will be done." (Notes, Matt. xxvi. 36-39. 42-46. John xviii. 1-3.) and David likewise speedily recovered his composure, and said, "Behold, here I am, let him do to me, as seemeth good unto him." (Notes, iii. 2 Sam. xv. 24-29.)—Every circumstance concurs in fixing this period as the date of the psalm: though some think it was composed during the persecutions which David endured for Saul.

V. 9-11. David had rescued Jerusalem from the Jebusites; and it became "the holy city," when the ark of God was placed there: yet it was now become the seat of violence and strife. (Note, 2 Sam. v. 6-8. vi. 12-19.) This he perceived at the breaking out of Absalom's rebellion, and therefore he would not venture to continue there; (Note, 2 Sam. xv. 13-15;) and when the usurper had got possession, mischief and sorrow, wickedness and guile, occupied the city in every part, parading it day and night, and guarding it against every approach of piety, equity, and loyalty, as against the most dangerous foes. (Note, 2 Sam. xvi. 15-23.) David therefore prayed, that the Lord would render the devices of the usurpers as Babel, by confounding their language and counsels, and thus leaving them to disunion, and mutual jealousies and suspicions. This was granted, when Hushai's counsel was preferred to Ahithophel's; and when that crafty politician, the stay of the whole party, went and hanged himself. (Notes, 2 Sam. xv. 31. xvii. 1-14. 23.)—Thus the nation of the Jews, after they had rejected Christ, were destroyed by being divided: and Jerusalem, having become the scene of every enormity, was miserably desolated by the Romans. (Notes, Matt. xxiii. 34-39. Rev. xi. 7-12.)

V. 12-15. Ahithophel's treachery was peculiarly distressing to David; and it was the more painful for being wholly unsuspected. So far from having been an avowed enemy, who now took occasion to reproach him, and to exult in his calamities, or menace his life; Ahithophel had been David's counsellor, and bosom friend, and had been treated by him as an equal, or as one of his own rank: he had also been his chosen and pleasing companion, in the exercise of religion, and in pious conversation. Yet this very man, without any affront, or previous quarrel, became an apostate and a traitor, and gave Absalom the most malicious and infernal counsel imaginable! (Notes, 2 Sam. xvi. 20-23. xvii. 1-4.)—Thus Christ was betrayed by one, whom he had honoured as a companion, a disciple, and an apostle; who resembled Ahithophel in his crimes and in his doom: for both were speedily overtaken by divine vengeance, in the same dreadful manner. (Note, 2 Sam. xvii. 23. Matt. xxvii. 3-5. John xiii. 18-30.) This was foretold by David concerning Ahithophel, and by

V. 4. (Notes, xi. 1-3. cxviii. 5-13. Is. xii. 2. Murg. Ref.) Uphold, Jonathan and some others adhered to David, and upheld his cause; and God would certainly favour them. (Notes, Gen. xii. 1-3. 1 Sam. xxii. 5. xxiii. 16-18. xxv. 23-31. 1 Chr. xii. 17, 18.)

V. 5. Truth. In fulfilling his promises, the God of truth would certainly cut off the enemies of his servant. (1 Sam. xxvi. 10.) This was well known; and therefore David only prayed for the accomplishment of the promises, attended with those circumstances, from which it was inseparable.—"The application to Christ and to Christians is plain and easy; for which reason our church has appointed this psalm to be read on Good Friday." (Bp. Horne.) (Notes, xxi. 8-12. lxxix. 22-28. cix. 6-20.)

V. 6. To offer thank-offerings and praise was right, pleasant, and acceptable to God. (Notes, xcii. 1, 2. cvii. 8, 9, 21, 22. cxvi. 17-19. Heb. xiii. 15, 16.)

V. 7. The words "<sup>a</sup>his desire," are not in the original, either in this or in any of the similar passages. (Note, xcii. 11.) We may suppose that David, as well as Jeremiah, could say, "I have not desired the woeful day, thou knowest." (Notes, Jer. xvii. 15-18. xlviii. 19, 20. Rom. ix. 1-3.) But he was assured that he should witness the awful judgments of God on his enemies, as well as the performance of his engagements to him.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

Our nearest relations may prove more unkind than strangers; they who ought to protect us may become our oppressors; and mere professors of true religion will generally behave to believers, worse than heathens do. So that, looking unto David betrayed by the men of Judah, and to Jesus betrayed by his apostle, and delivered to death by the Jewish rulers and people; what can we expect from any who "have not set God before them," except ingratitude, treachery, malice, and cruelty? But God is the helper of his people: he will favour and prosper those "that uphold their souls," while he confounds their persecutors: and his truth is engaged to reward evil to their enemies. Let us trust him and call upon him, when injured, or tempted: for his name's sake he will then save us, and plead our cause with all his power.—We should recollect past deliverances, to encourage our faith and prayer in present trials: and it is good and acceptable for us to sacrifice freely our spiritual oblations of grateful praise for the past, whilst we wait for further mercies.—As the risen and ascended Jesus could adopt the psalmist's words, and say, "He hath delivered me from all trouble, and mine eye hath seen his desire upon mine enemies;" so will his risen people at length be enabled to join in them.—"O Lord, help us to bear our cross without repining, and at length bring us to behold, and to share, thy victories and glory."

NOTES.

PSALM LV. V. 1. Hide not, &c. That is, 'Do not disregard my prayer, nor leave me to myself, when I cry for help in my extreme distress.' (Notes, xxviii. 1. Lam. iii. 8.)

V. 2. (Notes, xxii. 1, 2. xxxii. 3-5. Is. xxxix. 14, 15.)

V. 3. They cast, &c. This psalm is supposed to have been composed during Absalom's rebellion. The leaders of that faction, both out of malice, and to strengthen their party, charged David with various crimes of which he was not guilty. (Notes, 2 Sam. xvi. 1-6. P. O. 1-12. xvi. 5-15.) Thus Christ was falsely accused by those who had taken counsel to put him to death.

V. 4-8. In general, David shewed the firmest courage in the most extreme dangers: but the unnatural rebellion of Absalom, which he knew to be the correction of his sin in the matter of Uriah, quite unmanned him; and he was filled with terror and consternation. (Notes, 2 Sam. xv. 13-15. 23.) Nay, he

Jesus concerning Judas: for the words are in the future, and more naturally signify a prediction, than an imprecation. (Marg. Ref.)—‘The sudden destruction of Korah, Dathan, and Abiram, who, for stirring up rebellion against Moses and Aaron, “went down alive into the pit,” seems here alluded to; as the grand representation of the manner, in which the bottomless pit shall one day shut her mouth for ever upon all the impenitent enemies of the true King of Israel, and great high priest of our profession.’ (Bp. Horne.)

V. 17. (Notes, i. 7—15. cix. 2—5. Luke vi. 11, 12.)—Evening, &c. (17.)—Probably this was David’s general practice; from which he was not diverted by any of his troubles, but was rather made the more earnest in it. (Notes, Dan. vi. 10, 11. Acts x. 9—16. Marg. Ref.)—‘I will never give over my importunity, till he graciously grant my petition, and send me relief.’ (Bp. Patrick.)

V. 18. As this verse is in the past tense, while those which precede and follow it are future; the psalmist seems to refer to his former experience of the Lord’s goodness and faithful care of him; and thus to encourage himself and his friends to expect a happy event to their present perils. (Notes, 1 Sam. xvii. 34—37. 2 Cor. i. 8—11.) In former instances, when far superior forces had attacked him, God had delivered him in peace, and made him triumphant; for his invisible protectors and helpers were more numerous and powerful than all his visible foes. Thus our Lord said, “Thinkest thou, that I cannot now pray to my Father, and he shall presently give me more than twelve legions of angels?” And angels terrified and drove away the Roman soldiers, rolled away the stone from the sepulchre, and attended his resurrection and ascension. (Notes, Matt. xxvi. 47—56. xxviii. 1—8.)

V. 19. He “who inhabiteth eternity.” (Note, Deut. xxxiii. 27, 28. Is. lvii. 15, 16. Mic. v. 2.) hearing the prayers of his distressed servants, would certainly punish their persecutors; who had been hardened in impiety, by uninterrupted prosperity. Or, God would certainly afflict them, because they would not turn and fear him.

V. 20, 21. Absalom, or Ahithophel, seems to have been here intended: but the character and language of crafty, flattering courtiers, and of malicious dissemblers, in all ages, is emphatically described. Thus Judas betrayed Christ, when he had said, “Hail, Master, and kissed him.” (Marg. Ref.)

V. 22. ‘Whatever God has given or allotted thee, commit it all to his keeping by faith and prayer.’ This is the way of peace and safety. (Notes, xxxvii. 5, 8. Matt. vi. 25—34. Phil. iv. 7, 8. 1 Pet. v. 5—7.)

V. 23. Half, &c. Such persons, as are here described, generally come to a violent end, before half the years are elapsed, which they might otherwise have been expected to live. (Marg. Ref. Notes, 2 Sam. xvii. 23. xviii. 9—14.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The most excellent persons have always experienced the basest treatment in this evil world: and the more any mere man hath resembled the Son of God, in heavenly zeal and purity; the more hath he been traduced and hated by them, whose crimes he opposed, or whose hypocrisy he detected. The clamours and oppression, the calumnies and malice, of ungodly men, may, however, be the more easily endured, if we possess peace of conscience, and a sweet sense of the Divine favour. But when our sufferings from men excite in us the sense, or the dread, of the anger of our offended God; when a guilty conscience gives Satan advantage in assailing our peace, and sapping the foundations of our hope; we must needs “mourn in our complaint,” and the thoughts of our hearts will often become like the tempestuous waves of the restless ocean: so that, in this case, even eminent believers have been filled for a time with inexpressible horror and consternation. Yet none of them was ever so overwhelmed with terror and anguish, as the holy Jesus was; when “it pleased the Lord to bruise him, to put him to grief, and to make his soul an offering for our sins.” But in “his agony he prayed more earnestly,” and was heard and delivered: and if we trust in his merits, and copy his example, we too shall be supported under all, and carried through all. They, who are most conversant with mankind, will see the most to disquiet, discourage, and disgust them; if they have a spiritual judgment, and are labouring to do good. Disappointment and vexation, arising from the experience of the inconstancy, ingratitude, and treachery of mankind in general, will sometimes render them weary of the most eminent stations, and honourable services; and make them long for

PSALM LVI.

David prays for mercy; depending on the word of God, amidst the rage and malice of his enemies, 1—7. He comforts himself by thoughts of the Lord’s providential care and gracious promises; and by praising him for past deliverances, 8—13.

2 Mine <sup>t</sup>enemies would daily swallow me up: for they be <sup>d</sup>many that fight against me, O thou <sup>e</sup>most High.

3 <sup>f</sup>What time I am afraid, I will trust in thee.

4 <sup>f</sup>In God I will praise his word; <sup>i</sup>in God I have put my trust: I will not fear what flesh can do unto me.

retirement and obscurity, where they may no longer witness the miseries and crimes which they cannot prevent. This should induce us all to seek our rest in God, and to be willing to depart hence to a better world when he pleases: but we must not be “weary of well-doing,” or relinquish our work, till our Lord and Master release us: and at last no change can add to our present continued happiness, except that which augments our holiness.—No wickedness so distresses the believer, as that which he witnesses in the visible church of God: with anguish of heart he often perceives violence and discord in the congregations, where the gospel of peace is preached and professed; by which the common cause is weakened, the truth disgraced, and far more mischief done than by all the fury of persecutors. When professed Christians forsake God, and give way to malice, wickedness, and deceit; destruction and sorrow are at hand: disunion of heart, and intestine quarrels, make way for further evils; and, instead of a holy city, a Babel will be erected, which must also be destroyed.—The true Christian must expect trials from professed friends, from those whom he hath most trusted and served; and from those with whom he hath taken sweet counsel, and associated in the ordinances of God: this will be very painful, but by looking unto Jesus he will be enabled to bear it.—Though we must not pray for the destruction of our most treacherous injurers; yet we may warn them of the doom of those, who before them have trodden in the same path: and in every possible trial let us “call upon the LORD, and he will save us.”—Our souls need spiritual nourishment at least as often as our bodies need food: but we generally starve in the midst of abundance; because we pray so seldom, so superficially, and so formally.—David had more loyal subjects than he expected; Christ had more favourers than appeared, when the general cry was “Crucify him, crucify him:” and there are more true Christians, and believers have more real friends, than in their gloomy hours they suppose. If, however, God be for us, he will deliver our souls in peace from every conflict, whether few or many side with us: and it is better to have changes and afflictions, than to be hardened by uninterrupted prosperity, and thus emboldened to treachery and cruelty; which generally end in untimely death, and bring men down into the pit of destruction.—Flatterers, whose words are soft and insinuating, are always to be suspected and dreaded: for many of this company have war in their hearts; and by smooth, deceitful language do more harm, than they could have done with their drawn swords. But let us learn to trust only in the Lord, and to cast every burden upon him, by faith and prayer: for he will never suffer the righteous to be moved, either for want of inward supports, or outward protection. And, having thus found comfort ourselves, let us exhort and encourage our afflicted brethren to apply for the same relief.

NOTES.

PSALM LVI. Title. “Jonath-elem-rechokim,” signifies, the silent dove of distant places, or in a far country. David had been harmless as a dove, in the midst of Saul’s persecutions: he was silent and patient under oppression: he was now driven, like a timorous dove, to a distance from his home, and from the ordinances of God: and when exposed to extreme danger from the Philistines, set on perhaps by the relations of Goliath, he bore all patiently, and attempted no revenge. In this he typified the harmless, suffering, and patient Jesus. (Note, 1 Sam. xxi. 10—15.)

V. 1, 2. Whilst David remained in the land of Judah, his countrymen fought against him; and at Gath the Philistines sought to slay him. Thus Jews and Gentiles united against Christ; and his disciples are “hated of all men for his name’s sake.”—The word rendered “swallow me up,” seems to mean, pursue me panting, with eagerness and rage; as Saul of Tarsus breathed out threatenings and slaughter against the disciples of Christ. (Notes, xxvii. 1—3. Job xxxi. 29—32. Am. ii. 6—8. Acts ix. 1, 2.)—The last clause may be rendered, “There be many that fight against me from on high,” or, from a safe and fortified place. The original word is not the same which is generally rendered “most high.”

V. 3, 4. “In the time of alarm,” when others were dismayed, and he was tempted to fear; the psalmist determined to trust in God; and to honour his word, and glory in it, as a full security in every possible danger. (Note, xii. 5, 6. cxxviii. 2. Num. xxiii. 19. Matt. xxiv. 32—35.) He especially referred 8 Thou 'tellest my wanderings: 'put thou my tears into thy bottle: 'are they not in thy book?

9 When 'I cry unto thee, 'then shall mine enemies turn back: this I know; for 'God is for me.

10 'In God will I praise his word: in the LORD will I praise his word.

11 In God have I put my trust: 'I will not be afraid what man can do unto me.

12 'Thy vows are upon me, O God: 'I will render praises unto thee.

PSALM LVII.

In extreme danger, David fervently prays to be delivered from his cruel foes, 1—6. He encourages himself in praising God, and fervently prays that he may be universally glorified, 7—11.

V. 5. Wrest, &c. Or, "They thwart me in all my concerns." The words, in either sense of them, with the rest of this and the following verses, emphatically describe the conduct of the scribes and priests towards the Lord Jesus, of which the insidious perverseness and disingenuity, with which Saul and his courtiers treated David, were a sort of prefiguration. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 6, 7. (Marg. Ref. Note, xlix. 5.)

V. 8. Wanderings. In the translation used in the Common Prayer Book, the word flittings is used. This is a provincial term for removing from one residence to another; but it is not generally understood.—David was continually removing from place to place; but the Lord numbered all his wanderings, and watched over him wherever he went. His tears also were noticed, as if preserved in a bottle, or registered in a book: no doubt, therefore, his life would be precious in the sight of the Lord. 'If God keep the tears of his saints, much more will he remember their blood to avenge it; and though tyrants burn their bones, yet can they not blot the tears and blood out of God's register.' (Marg. Ref.)

V. 9—11. (Notes, 3, 4. xxvii. 1—3. xlvii. 7. lxii. 1—7. Rom. viii. 28—39.)

V. 12. Thy vows, &c. David had, it seems, made solemn vows, under his distresses, of rendering public praises unto God, when delivered; and of using his promised regal authority, to promote 'his glory; and he confidently expected, and fully purposed, to perform these vows. (Marg. Ref. Notes, lxvi. 13—15. Gen. xxxv. 1—3.)

V. 13. The Lord had rescued David from many imminent perils of death; and he trusted that he would keep him from falling by the hands of his enemies, that he might live, to walk before him, as his anointed king, in prosperity and usefulness. Or, he meant, that God, having saved his soul by converting grace, would uphold him in the ways of holiness, in which he desired to walk till he came to heaven. (Notes, cxvi. 8, 9. cxlv. 14.)—Light of, &c. (Notes, Job xxxiii. 27—30. Rev. xxi. 22—27.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The heavy and continued trials, through which many of the Lord's servants have passed, should teach us to be silent and patient under our lighter afflictions. "We have not yet resisted unto blood, striving against sin."—Our good words may, indeed, be wrested to an evil meaning; and our footsteps watched by those who devise evil against us; but we are not in general endangered by furious assailants, who would swallow us up, and destroy us; or at least, they, who would oppress us have their hands bound, or otherwise employed. Yet are we often tempted to repine and despond under our trivial sorrows! For this we should check and condemn ourselves; and, under every disquieting fear, we should place our confidence in God, and pray more earnestly for his pardoning mercy.—Meditation on the power of the Most High, engaged by his faithful promise for the protection of his people, will encourage us to say with boldness, "The Lord is my helper, I will not fear what man can do unto me:" (Note, Heb. xiii. 5, 6.)—The believer's soul, body, character, and interest, are all safe under the Divine protection; and when he prays earnestly, his enemies will be driven back and disappointed. Men may for a time prosper in, and by, iniquity; but God in his anger will soon cast them down: and our only security lies in escaping from iniquity.—The Lord graciously notes and orders the removals of his people; whilst they keep in the path of duty, they cannot be driven from his gracious presence; and their tears of godly sorrow, and those which are extorted by persecution, or sympathy with the sufferings of others, will be reserved to be jewels in the crown of glory. Let us then be careful to discharge our own obligations.—General vows are upon us as Christians, which have been ratified at baptism and the Lord's supper; and we have made promises and engagements in seasons of trouble and distress. Let us be careful to perform them, when delivered; and then we may leave all the rest with the Lord: and if his grace have delivered our souls from the death of sin; he will deliver our feet from falling, and bring us to heaven, to walk before him for ever "in the light of the living," in the bright world of perfect knowledge, love, purity, and felicity.

NOTES.

PSALM LVII. Title. Al-taschith, or, Thou shalt not destroy. Destroy not. This may intimate, that David trusted, that the Lord would not permit him to be destroyed, though closely pursued by Saul. Some think that the word refers to the restriction David laid on his officers, not to destroy Saul. (Notes, 1 Sam. xxiv. 4—7. Marg. Ref.)—Cave. (Notes, cxlii. V. 2. That performeth, &c. David could not perform for himself those things, which were requisite for his security, and advancement; he would not seek them by killing Saul, nor would he allow his soldiers to slay him: but he trusted in God, who had given him the promise of the kingdom, to perform all things necessary to its fulfilment in his own time and manner. (Notes, xxxviii. 12. 1 Sam. xvi. 13. xxiv. 4—7. xxvi. 8—12. 1 Kings xi. 37. xii. 2, 3. Phil. i. 7, 8.)

V. 4. My soul, &c. 'The fiercest beasts, the most devouring of elements, and the sharpest of military weapons, are selected to represent the power and fury of David's enemies: how much more furious were the enemies of Christ, who, in his passion, resembled Daniel in the lions' den, and the three children in the fiery furnace! V. 5. If David had been destroyed by his fierce enemies, God would have been dishonoured: but his marvellous deliverance and advancement were honourable to the name of the Lord; and even angels in heaven, as well as men on earth, would glorify him on that account.—In this he was peculiarly a type of the Saviour. David reproves unjust elders and judges, 1, 2. He describes the odious character of the wicked, 3-5. He predicts their ruin; and the joy of the righteous, on beholding the just judgments of God upon them, 6-11.

To the chief Musician, *Al-taschith, Michtam of David.

begin the day; and he would render his worship as public as he possibly could, that both the Israelities and the surrounding nations might hear.—This may with peculiar propriety be applied to Jesus, as risen from the dead, and exulting in the view of the glory of God in the conversion of the Gentiles. (Notes, 4. xxii. 22-28. xl. 9. 10. cviii. 1-5.)—Thy mercy, &c. (10.) (Notes, xxxvi. 6-9. lxxxix. 1-4. ciii. 11-15.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

Protection from man's injustice must be sought from the Lord's mercy; and the most eminent believers need frequently to reiterate the publican's prayer, "God be merciful to me, a sinner." But an inward consciousness, that our souls trust in the Lord, may enable us, in the most imminent dangers, to expect, that our calamities will at length be overpast: and, in the mean time, by faith and prayer, we must make the shadow of his almighty wings our refuge.—If we have fled from the wrath to come, unto Jesus Christ, we are interested in all his merits, grace, and victories; and in all the precious promises and glorious perfections of our God: and he, that hath performed all things requisite to the salvation of his people, will in answer to our prayers perform all things for us, and in us, which are needful to our enjoyment of it. It is true that the sons of men, among whom we live, are often savage as lions, and fierce as the flaming fire: their teeth seem to be spears and arrows, and their slanderous tongues, sharp swords: and Satan, a still more subtle, powerful, and cruel enemy, would swallow us up. But notwithstanding their snares and pits, their stratagems and assaults, we are safe, if we belong to the Lord. The Redeemer was far more exposed to their rage and malice, and by their wicked hands was crucified and slain: yet the Lord sent from heaven, and raised him from the dead, and advanced him to his glorious throne: and he will, through him, send forth his mercy and truth, and graciously accomplish his promises; he will rescue our souls from all tempters and persecutors; and angels shall join with men in beholding and celebrating his glory in our salvation. Let us then seek to have our hearts fixed on him, and prepared for his spiritual worship; to celebrate the praises of his boundless mercy and unfailing faithfulness, and to "glorify him with body and spirit, which are his." Let us assuredly expect and wait for, the completion of what concerneth us: and let us earnestly pray, that the Lord may be exalted above the heavens, and his glory above all the earth, by extending the blessings of his gospel through every part of the land. (Notes, lxvii. 1-7.)

NOTES.

PSALM LVIII. V. 1, 2. It is conjectured that Saul instituted a legal process against David; and, by corrupting the assembly of the elders, obtained an iniquitous sentence of treason against him, in order to cover his malicious persecution. Thus the Sanhedrim and the people of the Jews, and Pilate, condemned Jesus to be put to death. In both cases, the persons concerned inwardly designed and loved wickedness; and, whilst they pretended to weigh the cause in the balance of justice, they used their power to commit violence, after having deliberately considered the nature and consequences of their conduct: and this was the more heinous, as it was perpetrated by the magistrates placed over the people of God, "in the land" where his name was worshipped, and his oracles made known. On this their conduct, therefore, the psalmist makes a most solemn appeal to their consciences, and expressly charges them with extreme guilt. (Notes, lxxxii. 1-7. Marg. Ref.)

V. 3-5. The psalmist here traced back the base conduct of his persecutors, as he had done his own crimes, (Note, li. 5, 6.) to the source of original depravity; which had neither been counteracted by proper discipline, nor subdued by regenerating grace.—All wickedness springs from the alienation of the heart from God: and children very soon manifest evil tempers, and contract habits of lying and of other vices. If therefore they grow up, without change or restraint, and escape with impunity, or are even encouraged in wickedness; (as Saul's courtiers and judges were;) they will at length be hardened in sin, and ready to perpetrate any villany. The most hateful dispositions are found as natural to them, and as fatal to others, as the poison of a serpent. It was indeed commonly allowed, that some kind of music, or skilful incantations, would disarm the rage of serpents, in general: yet one species of adder seemed to be deaf, or as if she stopped her ears against the most skilful strains of those who attempted to charm her; thus no arguments, persuasions, or services, of David could mollify the evenenomed malice of Saul and his party against him.—In like manner the heavenly discourse and the beneficent miracles of Jesus did not disarm the rage of that "generation of vipers" against him: (Notes, cxi. 1-3. Matt. iii. 7-10. xxiii. 29-33.) and sinners still stop their ears, and close their hearts against conviction or persuasion, whilst they rush forward in rebellion and enmity against God and his cause. (Marg. Ref. Ec. x. 11-15. Jer. viii. 17.)

V. 6-9. David's enemies were strong and savage as young lions: he therefore prayed that their teeth might be broken, even their strongest teeth, their grinders, with which they were ready to devour him: that so they might be disabled from doing mischief. (Notes, xxvii. 1-3. lvi. 1, 2. lvii. 3, 4.) They overwhelmed him like an inundation: but he desired it might prove like a land-flood, which is soon wasted. They were about to shoot at him: but he would have their bows, or their arrows, to be shivered to pieces, and become like straw, and do no execution; and he prayed that they might waste insensibly as the snail, which leaves its substance all along its track: and that they might come to nothing, like an abortion. He also predicted, that their prosperous rage, (which resembled the crackling of thorns under a pot,) would soon be extinct, and produce no effect; whilst the Lord in his wrath would hurry them into speedy destruction; as a furious whirlwind drives a living man down a precipice, or into a dreadful pit. This seems the meaning of the passage: but the original is peculiarly difficult. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 10, 11. David's cause was that of true religion; and though he would not avenge himself, he knew that the Lord would, and with terrible displays of his power and wrath. Then the righteous would rejoice, not in the misery of Saul and his party, but in the display of the Divine glory, and in the triumphs of truth and piety over ungodliness and iniquity: nay, the most terrible circumstances of their ruin would add to the comfort and purity of the righteous; as if a man should wash his feet in the blood of those, who had trampled upon every thing sacred: whilst all who witnessed these events, would be constrained to confess, that "Verily there is a reward," (or fruit,) "for the righteous, verily he is God who judgeth the earth." Both the noun and participle are plural. (Note, Gen. i. 1.)—All this was most signally verified in the destruction of Jerusalem, after the Jews had crucified their Messiah: and it hath had, and will have, repeated accomplishments, in the establishment of true Christianity upon the ruins of its opposers: but the day of judgment will be its grand and final accomplishment. (Notes, xcvi. 13. Is. xxvi. 20, 21. xxxiv. lxxiii. 1-6. Mal. iii. 13-18. Rev. xiv. 14-20. xviii. 20-24. xix. 1-6. 17-21.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

Injustice established by law, and decreed by judges, is more malignant than any other.—It is grievous to behold the sons of men preying upon their own species; but more so to see the congregation of those, who profess to be the children of God, combining against the remnant of his true people. We may very properly appeal to the consciences of such iniquitous judges, whether indeed they speak righteously and decide uprightly. But the malice, avarice, or pride of their hearts prevails against their convictions; and their iniquity is intentional, deliberate, and determined.—Whilst we behold the effects of natural depravity in the horrid crimes of others; we should be humbled by recollecting, that the principles of them all are in our hearts also. We ought, therefore, to be thankful to the Lord for merciful restraints; earnest in seeking renewing grace; watchful over ourselves, and patient under the effects of our fallen nature in others. We may see, in our children, the wickedness of the world in embryo: their dislike to religion, their ingenuity at inventing lies, their pride, vanity, envy, and anger, are rank weeds, which, if neglected, will overspread their minds, and prevent the growth of every good thing. It is our duty, therefore, to bestow pains upon their education; and, above all, to pray for converting grace to make them new creatures.—But, though the poison of a serpent is within us, we may prevent in great measure its breaking forth to the injury of others. When the Saviour's instructions, reasonings, and persuasions are duly regarded, the very serpent becomes harmless and gentle like the dove. (Note, Is. xi. 6-9.) But they who refuse to hear him that speaketh to them, in strains of heavenly wisdom, must perish miserably and eternally; nor can all nature furnish images adequately to represent their dreadful doom. Though the righteous are not glad at calamities, yet they must rejoice to see the cause of God triumphant, and men on every side convinced that there is a reward for the righteous, and a God who judgeth the earth. They must therefore exult, on some occasions, in the ruin of terrible persecutors: they will in due time rejoice at the destruction of all antichristian corrupters of the faith; and at last, they will witness the perdition of ungodly men with unmingled joy, and sing, "So let all thine enemies perish, O LORD." (Notes, lxviii. 1-3. Judg. v. 30, 31. Est. viii. 15-17. ix. 17-32. Prov. xi. 10, 11.)

PSALM LIX.

David, in great danger, prays to be saved from his enemies, complains of their cruelty, but still trusts in God, 1-10. He prays for and predicts their confusion and ruin, and resolves to praise God continually, 11-17.

NOTES.

PSALM LIX. Title. (Notes, l Sam. xix. 11-18.) 'In this psalm David expresses what his thoughts and affections were, when Saul sent officers to watch his house all night, and to slay him when he came out of his doors in the morning.' (Bp. Patrick.)—His triumphant confidence in God in this extreme danger, and his anticipated fervour of gratitude, for the deliverance which he fully expected, shew a peculiarly pious and happy state of mind, in such trying circumstances.

V. 1, 2. (Marg. Ref.) Defend, (1.) Or, "Thou shalt set me on high." &c. The clause is future, and implies the strongest assurance of safety, and advancement above all enemies, grounded on the special promises of God. (Notes, xii. 5, 6. xci. 14-16. Is. xxxiii. 15, 16.)

V. 3, 4. David had not in any thing offended Saul, but was persecuted by him and his adherents, for his good deeds, not for his sins: and in this he typified the suffering, but perfectly holy, Jesus. (Notes, vii. 3-5. xxvii. 1-5. l Sam. xviii. 12-16. xix. 1-6. John xv. 22-25.)

V. 5. Heathen. (Notes, 8. x. 16. Is. i. 10-15. Jer. ix. 25, 26. Am. ix. 7-10.)—Be not, &c. The Lord's mercy and patience, towards the inveterate enemies of his cause, might appear to David ruinous to the interests of true religion in Israel: but the words are rather a prediction of that judgment "without mercy," which will be executed upon all the implacable opposers of Christ and his people; as they may literally be rendered, "Thou wilt not be merciful to any perfidious workers of iniquity."—They who repent cease to be "wicked transgressors," or "perfidious workers of iniquity;" and none of the impenitent find mercy. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 6. David's persecutors remitted their pursuit of his life, during the day-time: but in the evening they returned to hunt their prey, with menaces and reproaches, as the hound gives mouth when upon the scent after the hunted animal: thus they compassed the city to prevent his escape. The Scribes and Pharisees also chose the night for the season of their machinations against the Son of David. (Notes, Matt. xxvii. 1, 2. John xviii. 1-3.)

V. 7. The reviling menaces and proud boastings, which were vented from the furious malice of these persecutors, wounded David's peace and reputation like swords, and subverted their designs of murdering him: nor would they have dared to utter such notorious falsehoods, if they had not disbelieved the being of a God, or their accountableness to him. (Notes, lv. 20, 21. lvii. 4. Marg. Ref.)

V. 8. (Notes, ii. 1-6.)—In this psalm, (Note, 5,) and in other places, the Israelites, who set themselves against the man after God's own heart, are called "the heathen;" and in like manner the Jews, when they had crucified the Son of David, and persisted in refusing to submit to him, were excluded from the church of God, and have ever since been treated as a part of the Gentile world; except as marked with more striking indications of the Divine displeasure. (Notes, Is. lxxv. 13-15. Hos. iii. 4, 5.)

V. 9. "The more strong and the more malicious Saul is, the more will I look unto thee;—for thou, O God, art my sure refuge in my greatest distresses." (Bp. Hall.)—Many, however, suppose the psalmist to refer to the almighty power of God, as the ground of his cheerful confidence. (Marg. Note, 1, 2.)

V. 10. God, who had always shewn mercy and lovingkindness to his servant, would certainly come to his aid in this emergency, in some way beyond all human expectation; so that when he seemed to stand afar off, he would shew himself present, to prevent his enemies from hurting him. He would also exceed the hope of his friends; and even answer his prayers before they were finished.—Thus David would be enabled to look on his enemies without dismay, and would behold their disappointment.—Nothing is said, either in this or other similar passages, of David's desiring the destruction of his foes; and his conduct, when he heard of Saul's death, implies that he had not desired, though he had foreseen, the woful day. (Marg. Ref. (Note, liv. 7.)

V. 11-13. The rejection of the Jewish nation, their long continued dispersion, and their preservation as a distinct people, every where reminding men, all over the earth, of God's vengeance on those who reject his gospel, and proudly despise and blaspheme his Son; (whilst every successive generation allows the deeds of their fathers, by their enmity against Christianity;) form such a striking accomplishment of these verses, that we must conclude the Holy Spirit intended these events in them: though it is probable that David meant the disgrace, degradation, and gradual extirpation of Saul's family, for their opposition to the Lord's anointed, and all their imprecations and calumnies against him. Other obstinate opposers of genuine Christianity may also be intended. (Marg. Ref.)—"They shall be taken in their pride," &c. (12.)—"Let them," (or, men), "unto the ends of the earth, know that God ruleth," &c. (13.)

V. 14, 15. These verses may mean, that the punishment of David's persecutors would be answerable to their crimes: their clamours against him would be followed by howlings of distress, like those of the dog that is starving with hunger: they would in vain compass the city to find food, and would grudge all that went besides them. (Note, 6. Marg. Ref.)—The extreme famine in Jerusalem, when besieged by the Romans, and the state of the Jewish nation ever since, as destitute of the bread of life, might be alluded to.—But some think that David here again describes the conduct of his enemies, as foretelling and rejoicing in their disappointment; and that having repeated what he said before, adds what should be translated, "They wander up and down to devour me: and if they be not satisfied, they tarry all night." The words are throughout in the future tense, and may properly be thus rendered: "Surely they shall not be satisfied, though they tarry all night." (Title, Marg.)

V. 16. In the morning. (Note, Title.) David was confident that in the morning, when his enemies expected to devour him, he should in perfect safety be loudly singing the praises of God. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 17. (Marg. Ref. Note, 1 Pet. v. 10, 11.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

When we suffer for well-doing, we are conformed to our Redeemer, and have an evidence of our acceptance with God. We should indeed greatly fear suffering as "evil-doers, or busy-bodies in other men's matters;" but we ought not to be either afraid or ashamed of the hatred of the workers of iniquity, when "they prepare themselves, and are gathered together against us, without our fault." (Notes, Matt. v. 10-12. 1 Pet. iii. 13-18. iv. 12-16.) They may be both mighty and bloody; their words may be as swords, and their actions may correspond with them; but the Lord will awake, and behold, and hasten to the help of his servants.—In vain did Saul and his mighty men seek the life of David: they could not prevent his advancement to the throne, but they occasioned their own ignominy and ruin. Nor could the rulers of the Jews, by crucifying Jesus, prevent his glorification; but they thus hastened their own destruction; and neither tempters nor persecutors can succeed any better, in lying in wait for the soul of the believer. The serpent and his seed bruised the heel of the Redeemer, but he will crush their head. (Note, Gen. iii. 14, 15.) "Because of the Lord's strength," his servants may then confidently wait on him; and if we trust in him, as the God of our mercy, and have recourse to him in every temptation and tribulation, he will assuredly be our defence against all those that rise up against us. In proportion as we are conscious that we are not "wicked transgressors" who continue impenitent in known sin; we may be satisfied that our cause is of God.—The predictions, which we read, concerning the vengeance to be executed on all the implacable enemies of Christ and his kingdom, and upon all the impenitent and unbelieving; and the accomplishment of many of them in this present world, should impress our minds with an awe of the Divine majesty and purity, and a dread of all iniquity. —The destruction of Jerusalem, and the state of the Jewish nation for much above seventeen hundred years; when viewed in connection with that awful imprecation upon themselves and their children, which accompanied their malice and lying testimony against Christ; and their cry, “Crucify him, crucify him,” should make us tremble at the thought of lies and imprecations, which are the offspring of pride and hatred; (Notes, Matt. xxvii. 19—25:) and still more, lest we should at last be found despisers or abusers of his gospel. But we should also pray for the conversion of that people; that they may at length know, that Jesus is the Lord and God, and that “he ruleth in Jacob, and unto the ends of the earth.” Our prayers, however, for our personal enemies and the opposers of our holy faith, should be attended with solemn warnings: for no mercy will be shewn to obstinate and impenitent transgressors; but they will be eternal monuments of the Lord’s abhorrence of sin, whilst his wrath will be unto them as a devouring, yet unquenchable fire. But the trials of the upright will terminate in joy and praise: when the night of affliction is over, they will sing of the Lord’s power and mercy in the morning; (Note, xxx. 5:) he is their defence and refuge in the time of their trouble: let them now, in assured faith and hope, praise him for those mercies, for which they will rejoice in him, and praise him for evermore.

NOTES.

PSALM LX. Title. “Shushan-eduth” seems to mean a psalm of testimony set to an instrument of six strings. The psalm was intended to testify, and teach, the danger of opposing the servants of God, and the happiness of uniting with them. —“Aram-naharaim,” or Syria of the two rivers, that is, Syria between the Tigris and the Euphrates, denotes Mesopotamia: and Aram-zobah, Syria to the west of the Euphrates. (Notes, Gen. xxiv. 10. 2 Sam. viii. 13, 14.) —Valley of Salt. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 1—3. When Saul and his sons were slain, the Philistines triumphed, and the Israelites were scattered and dismayed. The setting up of Ishbosheth over the ten tribes, and the consequent division and civil war, made the land to tremble, broke its force, and exposed it to the common enemy. Thus the people of God, for their sins, were shewed “hard things,” and made to drink the wine of astonishment, as if they had been his enemies. (Notes, lxxv. 8. Is. li. 17—23. Jer. xxv. 15—17. 26. Lam. iv. 21, 22. Hab. ii. 15—17. Matt. xx. 20—23. xxvi. 36—39.) For the wound made by a skillful surgeon may be as painful as that made by a mortal foe; though it be given with a contrary intention, and save life instead of destroying it. (Notes, Job v. 18, 19. Is. xxx. 26. Hos. vi. 1—3.) —When the Israelites supported Saul, whom God had rejected, and who was evidently given up to the most furious passions, and to adopt the most ruinous measures; when to please him they concurred in persecuting David, the Lord’s anointed, whose wisdom and courage, as well as exemplary piety, loyalty, and patriotism, entitled him to their highest esteem and confidence; and when after Saul’s death they, at Abner’s instance, adhered to Ishbosheth, and carried on war against David, in direct opposition to the known will of God; they seemed to be perfectly infatuated, as if they had drunk some intoxicating poison, which had bereaved them of their senses, and so filled them with terror and amazement, that they knew not what they did. (Note, 2 Sam. ii. 9. 12, 13. iii. 17—21. v. 1, 2.)

V. 4. David, as anointed by God and advanced to the throne, was a banner given to the pious remnant of Israel: and it was displayed, that they might resort to it, and, under his authority and command, expect the performance of the Lord’s faithful promises, and the triumphing of his truth. (Notes, xx. 5. Ex. xvii. 15, 16.) —In this he was a type of Christ, and his kingdom and salvation. (Notes, Is. xi. 11—16. xlix. 22, 23. lix. 16—19. lxii. 10—12. John xii. 27—33.)

V. 5. David was beloved of God, and a type of his “beloved Son, in whom he is well pleased:” as his name signifies, (Notes, 1 Sam. xvi. 11. Ez. xxxiv. 23—31:) but the words in the original are plural, and evidently relate to Israel as the Lord’s chosen and beloved people; (Marg. Ref.) and the verse contains the intercession of David for his subjects; who prefigured in this our heavenly Advocate, who never fails to plead in behalf of all, however heretofore rebellious, who bow to the sceptre of his grace, and come to God by him. (Note, Heb. vii. 23—25. 1 John ii. 1, 2.)

V. 6—12. (Notes, Ps. lxxxix. 19. 37. cviii. 7—12. 1 Sam. vii.) God had, by ordering David to be anointed, as Saul’s successor in the kingdom, virtually promised him the throne over all Israel; as he had to Israel the dominion over the adjacent countries. The promises were in part fulfilled, as they related to David. Shechem, Succoth, Gilead, and Manasseh, were in his possession. These had been subject to Ishbosheth; who had also been supported by Ephraim, that powerful tribe, which was now become the guardian of David’s government and person: the legislative authority was transferred to the tribe of Judah, where it would continue till the coming of the Messiah: (Note, Gen. xlix. 9, 10. This prophecy is evidently referred to:) and whilst Israel, being willingly subject to David’s equitable government, shared its blessings, the neighbouring nations were about to be forced into submission. Moab would soon be reduced to bondage, and employed in the lowest menial services. David also fully expected in a short time to vanquish Edom, and take possession of it, by casting his shoe over it; or even tread it under foot and crushing its strength; as it had been predicted; (Marg. Ref.) and let Philistia now triumph over Israel as in times past, if it could: (an ironical challenge and defiance: Marg.) These conquests, however, were not yet completed. Bozrah of Edom, or some other strong city, (perhaps Rabbah of the Ammonites,) yet remained unsubdued: but David would not rely on his own valour and conduct, nor on those of his captains or allies, for completing his conquests; but on the Lord, who had “cast off his people,” but was now returned to them, and fought for them: and their enemies would soon perceive the difference between the armies of David, which JEHOVAH accompanied to the battle, and those of Saul, when JEHOVAH had doomed him to destruction.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The anger of God against sin is the sole cause of all misery, personal or public, in families, churches, and nations, that hath been, is, or shall be endured, in time or to eternity. —Professing churches are often cast off, and deprived of their privileges for their sins; nations tremble, and are broken for the same cause; yea, the earth, and creation itself, groan under the load of man’s guilt. (Note, Rom. viii. 18—23.) Even the true believer, when he commits iniquity, will sometimes be shewed heavy things, and made to drink of the wine of astonishment, till anguish and dismay for a time seize upon him. In all these cases, there is no remedy, but by returning to the Lord with repentance, faith, and prayer; and beseeching him to return to us, and heal the breaches which sin hath made. Blessed be his name, “he hath given a banner” in the cross of Christ, to those that fear his name; that resorting thither, and receiving mercy, they may enlist under him who now fills the mediatorial throne, and so wage successful war against the enemies of their souls. Oh! may this banner be every where displayed, that all nations may embrace the truth, and experience the faithfulness of God to his promises! —He who exalted the Saviour by his own right hand, to the throne of glory, will hear his intercession for all who pray in his name, and who are beloved for his sake; and save them also by his almighty power. He who is in Christ a new creature, may rejoice in all the precious promises, which God hath “spoken in his holiness,” and by his Holy One; and may consider the whole ransomed inheritance as his own reversion; and the present privileges to which he is called, and the sanctifying and comforting influences of the Spirit which he experiences, are the sure earnest of heavenly glory. If Christ be our’s, all things are our’s; mercy, grace, peace, wisdom, righteousness, strength, and victory; life and death, angels and men, earth and heaven, are our’s; and all things shall, in one way or other, subserve our eternal good. (Notes, Rom. viii. 28—39. 1 Cor. iii. 18—23.) We are not yet, however, made complete conquerors; and no true believer will abuse these truths, to the allowed indulgence of sloth or vain confidence. Trusting in God to arm us for the conflict, to lead us forth and support us, and to give

PSALM LXII.

David avows his confidence in God, and warns his enemies of their danger, 1-7. He exhorts the people to trust in the Lord; and not in men, in iniquity, or in riches, 8-10: for power and mercy belong to God, 11, 12.

To the chief Musician, to <sup>a</sup>Jeduthun, A Psalm of David.

ever.—No outward situation can exclude us from communion with God through Jesus Christ; but without divine assistance, we can neither climb, nor take shelter in, that rock of salvation: when therefore we perceive that there is safety in him, and none in ourselves, we should pray fervently for the Holy Spirit of promise, that we may by his gracious teaching and assistance, "believe to the saving of our souls." As genuine experience is acquired, encouragement will abound: for we shall more readily trust in the covert of his wings, when he hath been heretofore a shelter for us, and a strong tower from our enemies.—When we have the opportunity we should keep close to the ordinances of God: and we should remember, that he hears our vows, and witnesses our pious desires, intentions, and engagements; and therefore we should daily perform them. If he have given us the goodly "heritage of those that fear his name," (Note, cli. 4, 5.) we shall have enough: our anointed King is alive for evermore; and all his true subjects shall live by him, and with him, and thus abide before God for ever. Being made partakers of that grace and truth which came by Jesus Christ, we may rejoice and sing praise unto him, whatever be our outward circumstances: and whilst, according to our engagements, we are daily employed in his pleasant service, we may cheerfully pour to sing praises to him for ever and ever.

NOTES.

PSALM LXII. Title. Jeduthun was first chosen to be one of the chief musicians, when the ark was removed to mount Zion: (Notes, 1 Chr. xvi. 37-43. xxv. 1-6.) and as this psalm is inscribed to him, some have thought, that it relates to Absalom's rebellion, and not to the persecution which David endured from Saul. But as several other psalms, which certainly were composed before David came to the throne, are inscribed to the chief musician; we must suppose, that when the psalmody at the sanctuary was appointed, David delivered to the chief musicians the psalms which he had previously written as well as those which he afterwards from time to time composed.—Internal evidence does not clearly shew to which season of distress the psalmist referred; as his language seems equally suited to either of them.—"There are no petitions at all in this psalm; nor any thanksgivings: but only expressions of faith and confidence in God." (Bp. Patrick.) It may be added, "exhortations and encouragements to others, to trust in God, and pour out prayer before him."

V. 1, 2. The word rendered "waiteth" signifies silence. "Yet my soul keepeth silence unto God." "Though Satan tempted David to murmur against God, yet he bridled his affections, and, resting upon God's promise, he bare his cross patiently, and overcame all temptations."—David was conscious, that, in calm submission and well-grounded confidence, he sought and expected protection and deliverance from God. He therefore steadily adhered to the line of duty; believing it "good both to hope, and quietly wait, for the salvation of the Lord." (Note, Lam. iii. 26-30.) And he rested assured, that though his enemies might for a while give him some disturbance, yet he should not be "greatly moved," or materially injured, either in his temporal or spiritual concerns. (Notes, 5-7. xxxvii. 23, 24. 2 Cor. iv. 8-12.) (Marg. Ref.)

V. 3, 4. The psalmist, having avowed his confidence in God, expostulates with his enemies, warns them of their danger, and exposes their wickedness.—Saul and his party, envious of David's reputation, incessantly plotted against his life; and aimed to exclude him from the royal dignity, to which God had appointed him; and they greatly desired to see him disgraced by some evident misconduct. They "delighted in lies," both when they falsely accused him, and when they deceitfully spoke friendly to him: but by this they only brought ruin upon themselves; like a wall, which first bulges out and totters, and then falls down at once. (Note, Is. xxx. 12-14.)—In like manner, Absalom, Ahiathophel, and the other conspirators, artfully formed their measures for driving, with disgrace, their aged monarch from that honourable station to which God had raised him; (Note, liv. 20, 21;) and they covered their treachery and malice with fair pretences; but they only brought on themselves us strength in every time of trouble, we may do valiantly, and tread down all our enemies, and we shall ere long obtain the conqueror's crown. The church also, over which oppressors have so often insulted, as if the Lord had cast her off, shall speedily triumph over them all; and whilst they, who willingly submit to our anointed King, shall share his glories, all his foes shall be put under his feet. (Note, 1 Cor. xv. 20-28.)

NOTES.

PSALM LXI. V. 1, 2. This psalm seems to have been composed when David was driven by Absalom's rebellion, like an exile, beyond Jordan, to the extremities of the land, and far from the sanctuary of God. (Notes, xli. 1-3. xlii. 1-8. xliiii. lxxii. 1-4. 2 Sam. xv. 13-15. 21-30.) His heart was overwhelmed with complicated distresses, as by an inundation. The Divine mercy, support, and protection formed the rock, on which he desired to rest his soul, out of the reach of the tempestuous waves, which dashed and raged below; but he was like the shipwrecked mariner, who is exposed to the raging billows, from which he would be secured, if he could reach the summit of a rock that is close to him: but it is far too high for him to climb it without help. Thus David found, that he could not but by faith and hope ascend, and be established on the "rock of salvation," unless the Lord led him to it, and helped him to get upon it. (Marg. Ref. Note, xl. 1-5.)

V. 3. "Nothing doth more strengthen our faith, than the remembrance of God's succour in times past." (Marg. Ref.) (Notes, iii. 3-5. lxxi. 17, 18. exvi. 2. 1 Sam. vii. 12. xvii. 34-37. 2 Cor. i. 8-11.)

V. 4, 5. The psalmist, though now driven away from the courts of God, rested assured that he should be restored again to them, and perpetually enjoy the comfort and benefit of public ordinances: (Note, xxvii. 4-6.) but he seems also to have looked through the shadow of the earthly sanctuary, to "the holy places not made with hands," and to have exulted in hope of the eternal felicity of heaven; as now abiding under the covert of the Almighty, and being "kept by his power through faith unto salvation." For it can hardly be supposed, that he meant his temporal authority, by that "heritage of those that fear the name of God," which had been given him in common with other pious persons, in answer to his earnest prayers and solemn vows.—For ever, (4.) For ages. The word is plural, (olamim, or gnolamim.—(Wings. "Wings of the cherubim," say some. These indeed covered the mercy-seat, as representing the angels bowing down to look into the mysteries of redemption. (Notes, Ex. xxv. 10-21. 1 Pet. i. 10-12.) But they were placed in the holy of holies, and inaccessible to the worshippers: and unless these cherubim were the same with JEHOVAH himself, I see not how the construction can keep clear of substituting creatures in the place of the almighty Cr-ator. (Notes, Gen. iii. 22-24. Ez. i. 3-14. x. 3, 4. Rev. iv. 4, 5.)

V. 6, 7. David might here mean himself as king of Israel: though apparently deposed, he trusted, that he should yet live, and reign over the people of God, for some time to come; and his kingdom would be continued in his posterity to future generations, according as God had mercifully promised, and would faithfully perform.—But the King Messiah, as descending from him, who was to reign for ever over the house of Israel, and by whom the mercy and truth prepared for sinful men was to be conferred, seems to have been especially intended. (Note, John i. 17.) Whatever became of David's personal interests, he rejoiced in the prospect of the Messiah's kingdom: and prayed for the faithful performance of God's gracious promises, which form the stability of his mediatorial throne.—The Chaldee paraphrase of the sixth verse is very remarkable, "Thou shalt add days to the days of King Messias; his years shall be as the generation of this world, and of the world to come." (Horne.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

When removed from other comforts, we should more earnestly seek consolation from God; and when cares, fears, sorrows, or temptations, like a wild deluge, overwhelm our hearts, our cries unto him should be more fervent than

David, praying for deliverance, describes the malice and subtlety of his enemies 1-6. He predicts their ruin, and the effects of it on the beholders, 7-10.

Cant. i. 4. 1 Cor. xi. 23-28. (Marg. Ref.)—Can any candid man read this psalm, and then speak of true devotion, as merely intellectual, a dispassionate exercise of the understanding, without any warm emotions or vehement affections of the heart? Weighed in the balance of such phlegmatic Christians, the man after God's own heart must be numbered among enthusiasts; for, though his devotion was most rational, it certainly was most fervent and enraptured; and, in fact, the more rational on that very account.

V. 7, 8. The recollection of past protection and deliverance, encouraged David not only to rely on the power, truth, and love of God, in his extremest dangers; but to rejoice in this confidence under his sharpest afflictions.—His soul cleaved unto God, as the child clings about its kind parent, when alarmed, or in pain; and "followed hard after him," earnestly seeking nearer communion and conformity; being upheld by the power of divine grace, in thus pressing forward in his heavenly course. (Note, lxxiii. 23-28.)—The fervour of David's devotion, whether pouring out his soul in earnest prayer, with vigorous exercises of faith and hope; or celebrating the praises of God with admiring love, joyful gratitude, and glowing zeal for his honour and glory, seems especially to have procured him the honourable distinction of "the man after God's own heart."—The following verses from Dr. Watts well support the animation of the leading parts of this exquisitely beautiful psalm:—

With heart, and eyes, and lifted hands,
For thee I long, to thee I look;
As travellers, in thirsty lands,
Pant for the cooling water-brook.

With early feet I love t' appear
Among thy saints, and seek thy face;
Oft have I seen thy glory there,
And felt the power of sov'reign grace.

Nor fruits nor wines that tempt our taste,
Nor all the joys our senses know,
Could make me so divinely blest,
Or raise my cheerful passions so.

My life itself without thy love,
No taste of pleasure could afford:
'Twould but a tiresome burthen prove,
If I were banish'd from the Lord.

Amidst the wakeful hours of night,
When busy cares afflict my head,
One thought of thee gives new delight,
And adds refreshment to my bed.

I'll lift my hands, I'll raise my voice,
While I have breath to pray or praise;
This work shall make my heart rejoice,
And spend the remnant of my days.

V. 9-11. The psalmist while employed in these devout exercises, clearly foresaw the disgraceful end of his persecutors. They would perish, as if swallowed up by the earth with Dathan and Abiram; (Note, Num. xvi. 28-34;) or, falling by the sword, they would be left unburied, for food to the foxes, with which the land abounded. This was, probably, the case with many who fell at Gilboa.—He also foresaw himself, as advanced upon the throne, to be king of Israel; and as rejoicing in God, and not in his outward dignity, or the ruin of his enemies; whilst every one who cordially swore allegiance to him, or who, as worshippers of God, swore with solemnity by his name, would glory in the advancement of his servant; and all who falsely accused, or attempted to deceive him, would effectually be confuted and silenced. (Marg. Ref.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The true believer is convinced, that nothing in this world can satisfy the desires of his immortal soul; and he, therefore, expects happiness from the eternal God, as his God and portion. (Note, Deut. xxxiii. 27-29.) In his more lively frames, an inextinguishable thirst after the discoveries of his glory, and the experience of his grace and love, lead him to seek the Lord early, every day, with the best of his time and the prime of his affections. He likewise greatly values public ordinances; and when confined from them, or constrained to live among those who know not God, he regrets his loss; feels as one banished into a parched wilderness; and, with a mixture of pleasure and pain, recollects how he "has seen the power and glory of God in his sanctuary." (Note, xlii. 4, 5.) This uneasiness, to which he is occasionally liable, arises from the same source with another part of his experience, which is more habitual, especially when faith and hope are most in exercise; the world itself appears to him a weary desert, and he longs for the joys of heaven, of which he hath had some foretastes in the ordinances of God on earth. Yet, even in this wilderness wells of salvation are opened; (Note, Is. xlii. 3;) his gracious thirst is in part allayed: and the want of stated means of grace sometimes excites more vigorous desires, and more earnestness in waiting on God in secret. The believer in this frame of mind values the lovingkindness of God more than life; and is even willing to depart hence, that he may fully enjoy it. (Note, Phil. i. 21-26.) This foretaste and prospect tune his heart and lips to praise the Lord, and to rejoice in the midst of tribulation; and he desires, as a sweet solace during his weary pilgrimage, "to bless the Lord while he lives, "and to lift up his hands in his name."—Then the pleasures of the world lose their attraction; "for his soul is satisfied, as with marrow and fatness," whilst joyfully praising and thinking upon God; and such contemplations at once excite his gratitude, increase his confidence, and animate him in seeking conformity and nearness to the Lord; aspiring after still greater attainments, as feeling himself upheld by the power of the Almighty.—To mount with David towards heaven, in these exalted strains of devotion and zeal, should be our holy ambition: true Christians can in some measure, and at some times, appropriate his emphatical language; but, alas! we too commonly have to complain, "that our souls cleave to the dust." Let us then be more instant in prayer, that we may be quickened according to his word of promise.—The enemies of such Christians as have been feebly described, are also enemies of Christ our King: present disgrace and eternal ruin will be their doom, if they persist in their enmity; and the lies, with which they blaspheme the Redeemer, or slander his people, or deceive one another, shall be silenced in anguish and despair. But our King having now entered upon "the joy set before him," all who bow before him, and swear fealty to him, shall rejoice and glory in God with him; and obtain an honour and happiness infinitely superior to that of the most exalted throne on earth. And if the Israelites had reason to rejoice in their king; how much more should we glory in our King of righteousness "and peace!" (Note, Heb. vii. 1-3.)

NOTES

PSALM LXIV. V. 1. Fear. Thus our Liturgy: 'That we, surely trusting in thy defence, may not fear the power of any adversaries.' 'By thee, we being defended from the fear of our enemies.'—God as effectually answers these petitions by increasing our faith, as by removing the danger. (Notes, lv. 4-8. Acts xviii. 9-11.)

V. 2, 3. It is probable, that the secret consultations of Saul and his courtiers against David, and the deceitful and violent measures which they adopted in order to destroy him, gave occasion to this psalm.—Open reproaches and false accusations would like a sword in close fight: secret detraction slays like an arrow shot from a distance, or in the dark, or by one concealed from view. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 4, 5. David was not only an upright character, but he was perfectly innocent of those crimes which were laid to his charge: (Notes, vii. 3-5. xlvii. 1-5:) yet his enemies, not having the fear of God before their eyes, and being hardened against the dread of consequences, propagated their calumnies, secretly, but very rapidly; encouraging one another, and consulting together, in what way to ensnare and destroy him; fully expecting to escape detection, and acting as if God himself did not see them, or would not call them to account for their wickedness. (Marg. Ref. Notes, x. 2-11. xxxvi. 1. lix. 7.)—'Envy and malice crucified the Son of God; but during the course of their proceedings against him, you hear only of zeal for the law, and loyalty to Cæsar.' (Horne.)

V. 6. This verse may be rendered, perhaps more literally, "They search out iniquities: we are consumed by that which they have thoroughly searched out; (Mag.) for the inward part and the heart of man is very deep." Saul and his partisans searched to find out some real or apparent iniquity, that David had committed, in order to cover the malice of their persecution; and they sedulously contrived new methods of perpetrating their crimes. Their intentions, however, were carefully concealed; and the malice, dissimulation, and wickedness, of their hearts, were deep and unfathomable. (Notes, v. 9. Jer. xlvii. 9. 10. Rev. ii. 24-25.)

8 So they shall make <sup>a</sup>their own tongue to fall upon themselves; <sup>a</sup>all that see them shall flee away.

10 <sup>a</sup>The righteous shall be glad in the Lord, and shall trust in him; and all <sup>a</sup>the upright in heart shall glory.

V. 7—9. While the persecutors were levelling their arrows, and about to shoot suddenly at David, God would unexpectedly cut them off; and their mortal wounds would be inflicted at once, while they were promising themselves complete success. (Note, vii. 8—13.) Their blasphemies, perjuries, imprecations, and slanders, would, as an immense load of guilt, fall on them, and sink them into destruction. (Notes, Prov. xii. 13. xiii. 3. xviii. 6, 7.) Their doom would be so dreadful, that the spectators would flee away, lest they should be involved in it; and all who heard of it would fear to imitate their conduct; be constrained to acknowledge the hand of God; and, learning useful instruction from the awful dispensation, would cause others to understand it. Thus the benefit, derived from it by numbers, would illustrate the wisdom and goodness, as well as justice, of God, in his severity towards these wicked men. (Marg. Ref.)—The dreadful imprecation of the Jews, when demanding our Lord's crucifixion, "His blood be on us and on our children," has indeed fallen upon them. (Note, Matt. xxvii. 24, 25.)—The destruction of Jerusalem filled the beholders with terror, and forced them to acknowledge that it was the work of God. Even Titus, the Roman emperor, confessed that he had fought and conquered by the favour of the Almighty; and the nation of the Jews, scattered through the world, affords a most instructive lesson to every land, and to all succeeding generations.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The continuance or renewal of our trials will render the repetition of the same petitions requisite; but varied expressions may often be affecting and useful to ourselves and others.—When faith in God triumphs over the fear of powerful and malicious men, our prayers are certainly heard, and final deliverance from the danger will in due time follow.—The most blameless will be reviled, and the most useful hated, by such men as took secret counsel, or made open insurrection, against the perfect and divine Saviour, and who whetted their tongues, and shot their sarcasms, against him, before they shed his blood.—Such transgressors are often inwardly alarmed with the dread of consequences; but they encourage each other, till they flatter themselves with the hopes of impunity, and despise the all-seeing eye of God. Actuated by the most malignant enmity, with deep dissimulation they search out iniquities, that they may pretend zeal for God's glory, whilst they are murdering his people; (Notes, Matt. xxvi. 57—68.) but all their malice will rebound upon themselves, and God himself will fight against them and destroy them; and all, who behold their doom in a future state, will reverence his power and justice in it. But it is our wisdom now to fear because of the judgments of God, and to flee from the wrath to come; to declare and consider his works, and to shun the rock on which others have split. For the righteous alone can rejoice and trust in this holy Lord God; and all, who uprightly rely on his mercy, and seek to know and do his will, shall glory in him as their salvation and eternal portion.

NOTES.

PSALM LXV. V. 1. Some expositors think that this psalm was composed after the famine of three years, which occurred towards the close of David's reign; when God had heard the prayer of his people, and was intreated for the land; and the concluding part of it renders that opinion highly probable. (Notes, 2 Sam. xxi. 1—14.) 'It becomes us, O God, to praise thee in thy sanctuary, (though we cannot worthily express, but must rather silently adore, thy incomparable excellencies,) and to pay the vows which we made unto thee in the time of our distress.' (Bp. Patrick.)—The old-testament church waited in silent expectation for the coming of the Messiah, and the accomplishment of the promises, prepared then to burst forth into vocal praises, and to perform her vows. Zion was the centre of her worship, and the type of the true church, whence alone cordial praises are rendered by any of our fallen race. (Note, Rev. xiv. 1—5.)

V. 2. The readiness of the Lord to answer prayer, when extensively made known, would induce men of all nations to come and worship him on his mercy—seat in Zion; and the answer of the church's prayer, in the coming of the Messiah, would make way for the propagation of the gospel among the gentiles; till, at length, all the human race shall come to God, as his suppliants. These events the psalmist evidently predicted. Indeed, all men, in every age, should be invited to come, and ought to come, and will be welcomed, if they come, to God, on the throne of grace. (Notes, Heb. iv. 14—16. vii. 23—25.)

V. 3. 'Nor need their sins,' (the sins of those who come to God,) 'discourage them; for thou hadst matter enough of that kind against me, to have hindered the prevalence of my prayer, if thou hadst charged my iniquities upon me. But thou hast been graciously pleased to forgive not only me, but my people, their transgression.' (Bp. Patrick.) 'O God, our iniquities stand in the way of thy mercies, and prevail strongly against all the endeavours of my reformation; but, do thou both mercifully forgive, and powerfully remedy, our offences.' (Bp. Hall.) 'He imputeth it to his sins, and the sins of the people, that God who was accustomed to assist them, withdraweth his succour.'—The psalmist evidently experienced, as the apostle afterwards, that "when he would do good, evil was present with him;" and the mercy and grace of God, through the promised Saviour, to take away both the guilt and power of sin, were his only support. (Notes, Rom. vii. 13—25.) Hoping for his deliverance from guilt and depravity, he determined to persist in waiting on God, seeking his glory, expecting his help, and celebrating his praises.

V. 4. Here the psalmist seems to congratulate the priests and Levites, on their happiness, in being chosen to the sacred office of ministering to God in holy things, as their constant employment. But this was only an emblem of the spiritual priesthood, the chosen of God, to whom David belonged, though a king, and of Judah: and, therefore, he joins himself with those who would be satisfied with the rich provisions of the sanctuary, the spiritual communion with God, of which the feasts on the peace-offerings were an external sign. (Notes, i. 1—3. xxvii. 4—6. xxxvi. 5—9. lxxxiv. 4, 5. 8—11. lxxviii. 1.)

V. 5. The terrible judgments, which God in righteousness inflicted upon Pharaoh, the Egyptians, the Canaanites, and the other enemies of Israel, were answers to the prayers of his people; the dreadful judgments on the Philistines, Syrians, and others who opposed David, were the same; and so were the terrible things, by which the Christian dispensation was introduced, and the foundations of idolatry overturned. 'Thou wilt declare thyself to be the preserver of thy church, in destroying thine enemies, as thou didst at the Red sea.'—It is, however, evident, that the terrible judgments executed on those, both Jews and Gentiles, who opposed the establishment of Christianity, were especially predicted; because these happened at that season, when the "God of salvation" became the "confidence of all the ends of the earth," and "of them that were afar off in the isles of the sea." (Marg. Ref.)

V. 6, 7. That almighty God, who created and preserves the vast mountains; who sets bounds to the tempestuous sea, and rules its waves in the most furious storms; who divided the Red sea before Israel, and with it overwhelmed Pharaoh and his host, still protects his church; and, by the same power, he restrains the madness of enraged multitudes, or of haughty tyrants, and calms their fury or crushes their power, whenever they attempt anything contrary to his wise, faithful, and merciful designs.—Who can read these verses without thinking of Him who "rebuked the wind, and said to the sea, Peace, be still; and the wind ceased and there was a great calm;" and who said, to the furious company that came to apprehend him, "I am he," and, "they went backward and fell to the ground?" (Notes, Matt. viii. 23—27. John xvii. 4—9.)

V. 8. Several of the appearances in nature excited a fear of the Divine power among the heathen; whilst the ordinary course of providence caused them to rejoice; even from the most eastern regions whence the morning-sun appears, to the most western whither he retires when it is evening. The reports also of the judgments of God, on the enemies of Israel, excited consternation in distant nations; and the glad tidings of his salvation have made, or will make, the inhabitants of every land to rejoice.

full of water: "thou preparest them corn, when thou hast so provided for it.

10 Thou waterest the ridges thereof abundantly; thou "settlest the furrows thereof: thou "makest it soft with showers: "thou blessest the springing thereof.

11 Thou "crownest the year "with thy goodness; and "thy paths drop "fatness.

12 They "drop upon the pastures of the wilderness; and the little hills "rejoice on every side.

13 "The pastures are clothed with flocks: the valleys also are covered over with corn: "they shout for joy, they also sing.

PSALM LXVI.

The psalmist exhorts all men to observe the works of God, and to praise him, with solemn awe and lively gratitude, 1-9. He shews how God had tried and delivered his people, 10-12. He determines to perform his vows; and declares how God had answered his prayers, 13-20.

To the chief Musician, A Song or Psalm.

MAKE a joyful noise unto God, "all ye lands:

V. 9. "Thou visitest the land, and desirest it, (or causeth it to desire,) and greatly enrichest it."—"The river of God," in this connection, evidently denotes those abundant and constant supplies of water, with which the Lord replenishes and fructifies the earth, as a large river waters the country through which it flows; but under that emblem the pouring out of the Spirit, after the ascension of Christ, and the blessed effects that followed, seem to have been predicted.

V. 10. "Do thou water the ridges abundantly, do thou cause the rain to descend into the furrows," &c. This verse seems to be a prayer for the blessing.—Thus the land is made ready for the seed, after man has properly tilled it; and when he has sown the corn, the Lord causes it to grow and ripen. In like manner, while his ministers use appointed means, and sow the seed of divine truth; God both prepares the hearts of the hearers, and gives the increase.

V. 11. "The herbs, fruits, and flowers, produced by the earth, are as a beautifully variegated crown set upon her head, by the great Creator." (Horne.) Every year also is thus crowned by his bounty. Wherever the Lord passeth, he scattereth abundance around his paths; and the clouds, which are called his chariots, drop down fatness on the earth. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 12, 13. Nothing can be more beautifully descriptive of a fruitful country, in a favourable season, than these verses: while the poetical representation of the little hills "girding themselves with gladness;" and pastures and valleys, covered with flocks and crops of corn, exulting and shouting for joy, has peculiar animation.—The same metaphors are often used for the happy effects of the gospels, when successfully preached, especially in places before enveloped in darkness. (Marg. Ref. Notes, xcvi. 11-13. xcvi. 7-9. Is. xlii. 10-12. lv. 12, 13.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

Our God reveals himself upon a mercy-seat, ready to hear and answer the prayers of all, who come to him by faith in Jesus Christ; men in general are invited to come unto him, and seek his face; and in due time all the inhabitants of the earth shall become his worshippers. As the Lord fulfils his promises, the church reiterates his praises; the new-testament church renders that praise, and performs those vows, which the old-testament church engaged for, when waiting and praying for the coming of the promised Redeemer; future generations shall praise him for hearing our prayers for the predicted success of the gospel through the earth; and every believer will render him praises, as he graciously fulfils his promises. Thus "praise waiteth for our God in Zion;" and thus are "the vows performed," which continually accompany the prayers of his people; and indeed are implied in them. And we may urge this as a cogent plea for the granting of our petitions, seeing it will redound to his glory. Nor can either the number, or prevalence, of those iniquities, for which we are humbled, invalidate the plea, when we come in the Redeemer's name; because "as for our transgressions, he will purge them away," "to the praise of the glory of his grace."—Blessed indeed is that man, whom the Lord chooseth, and by his Spirit causeth to approach him, in humble faith and prayer; and who, finding acceptance with him, learns to delight in his courts and ordinances, as the rest of his soul.—We may find that satisfaction in the goodness of his house, which others in vain expect from the world: and, whilst we see these blessings spring from his special love and choice, we may rejoice at the prospect of the eternal completion of them in his holy temple above. It is, however, only through that Blessed One, who was chosen to approach unto the Father, and to abide in the true tabernacle, as our Advocate, that we sinners can expect or experience this felicity: and through him, "the God of our salvation" is become the "confidence of all the ends of the earth;" even of us Britons too, who are indeed "afar off upon the sea," at a vast distance from the land, in which the sacred oracles were first given. But these blessings, communicated to mankind in answer to the prayers of his people, have been attended with terrible vengeance upon opposers: still more dreadful things will accompany the further prevalence of the gospel: and the complete salvation of the church will be attended by the eternal destruction of the ungodly. Nay, the Lord often answers the prayers of his people, with such convictions, rebukes, and corrections, as are for the time very terrifying to them.—But let us trust his power, truth, and love; and "submit to his righteousness." The "strength, which setteth fast the mountains," upholdeth the believer; the word, which "stilleth the stormy ocean," can silence the tumult and rage of our most numerous and potent enemies: and he, who enrichest the earth with such abundant and varied liberality, can neither want sufficiency, nor bounty, to feed the souls of his people. We should then adore the tokens of his power, in taking righteous vengeance on his enemies, and rejoice in beholding it displayed in mercy. We should, with wonder, gratitude, and praise, behold, and participate, the abundance, which, by the wise and kind providence of God, is diffused through the earth; and, whilst we see year after year crowned with the goodness of the Lord; so that the hills and valleys, covered with corn and cattle, seem to proclaim and rejoice in their Creator's praise; we should remember our unworthiness, be thankful for our portion, and use it to the glory of the giver; admire and imitate his goodness to the wicked and ungrateful children of men; and pity and pray for those who abuse these gifts to the dishonour of the giver.—But these temporal mercies, to us unworthy creatures, shadow forth more important blessings. The rising of "the Sun of righteousness," and the pouring out of the Holy Spirit, that "river of God," full of the waters of life and salvation, render the hearts of sinners, which before were hard, barren, and worthless, fruitful in every good work; and change the face of nations, far more than the sun and rain do the face of nature. Wherever the Lord passes, by the preaching of his gospel, attended by his Holy Spirit, "his paths drop fatness;" and numbers of every description are taught to rejoice in him and praise him. These blessings have already been extended to many nations, which were far off: may we unite in prayers that they may descend upon the pastures of the wilderness, the heathen world, and the poor benighted Jews: that the whole earth may hear and embrace the gospel; and that all, who are favoured with the means of grace, may bring forth abundantly "those fruits of righteousness, which are through Jesus Christ, to the glory of God, the Father."

NOTES.

PSALM LXVI. Title. The double title, "A Song, a Psalm," (or, is not in the original,) is supposed by some to mean, a very joyful song of praise.—The name of David is not affixed to this psalm; and various opinions have been entertained concerning the time, author, and occasion of it, but it is highly probable that it was written by David, when established on the throne, and made victorious over his enemies on every side.

V. 1-3. The psalmist earnestly excites all the inhabitants of the land, (the noun is singular, though the verb is plural,) to exert their powers to the utmost, in celebrating the praises of God, who had remarkably interposed in their behalf; and had executed such terrible punishment on their enemies, that many who inwardly disliked them and their religion, being alarmed by the power of his works, had reluctantly submitted themselves, and professedly, yet insincerely, become the worshippers of JEHOVAH. This was the effect produced by the gospel in the first ages, when numbers, by the miracles wrought, and the judgments of God inflicted on the Jews and other opposers of Christianity, feigned submission to the divine Saviour, and embraced Christianity, without any real change of heart or character. (Marg. Notes, lxxviii. 35, 36.—xviii. 44. Marg.)

V. 4. The words rendered "all the earth" may mean all the land: yet the verb is plural, and all the inhabitants are meant.—The passage, however, is not so evidently a prophecy of a more enlarged dispensation than that of Moses, as many are which occur in these psalms; yet even these were entirely overlooked by the Jews in the time of Christ. In like manner the clearest and most explicit predictions, that the kingdom of Christ shall at length be established all over the earth, are little attended to by numbers of Christians; but will most certainly be at length accomplished. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 5. "He toucheth the slothful dulness of man, who is cold in the consideration of God's works!" (Notes, xli. 8, 9. cxi. 2-4. cxvii. 1-3.)

V. 6. The miraculous passage of Israel over the Red Sea, which overwhelmed the Egyptians, and their secure march through the divided streams of Jordan, to possess Canaan and extirpate the inhabitants, are celebrated in this verse. All Israel rejoiced in the temporal benefits thus conferred on them; but the true church rejoiced in God their Saviour and friend, and the display of his glory in these events. Israel, as the visible church, was considered as one body, which rejoiced and exulted on that occasion.—Moses, Aaron, Miriam, and all Israel, led the song of joyful praise on the banks of the Red Sea, and transmitted both the benefits, and the grateful and triumphant remembrance of them, to the next generation. (Notes, cvi. 6-14. Ex. xv. 1-21.) Thus, from age to age, the church rejoiced and blessed God, in concert with those who were eye-witnesses of his wonderful works.

9 Which holdeth our soul in life, and suffereth, not our feet to be moved.

10 For thou, O God, hast proved us: thou hast tried us, as silver is tried.

11 Thou broughtest us into the net; thou laidest affliction upon our loins.

12 Thou hast caused men to ride over our heads; we went through fire and through water: but thou broughtest us out into a wealthy place.

13 I will go into thy house with burnt-offerings; I will pay thee my vows, 14 Which my lips have uttered, and my mouth hath spoken, when I was in trouble.

V. 7. (Note, 2 Chr. xvi. 7—14.) 'He observes the motions of all nations, who may learn, by the Egyptians and Canaanites, that they who contemn his authority, in vain endeavour to exalt themselves;—for they shall certainly be abased.' (Bp. Patrick.) The last clause is more literally, "The rebellious shall not exalt themselves."

V. 8—10. (Marg. Ref.) The dangers and distresses, by which Israel had been tried and proved as in a furnace, during their bondage in Egypt, and afterwards in the time of the judges, and during some parts of Saul's reign, seemed to threaten the destruction of their existence as a nation; yet God had wonderfully preserved and delivered them; as a man's life is saved from imminent danger, or his health established after some very dangerous disease, or his steps upheld on the slippery brink of a precipice. (Marg. Ref.)—The astonishing preservation of the Jews as a separate people, during their long-continued dispersions and oppressions to this day; when it shall be crowned (as assuredly it shall be,) by their conversion to Christianity and restoration to the promised land, will constitute a still more extraordinary instance of the watchful care of Providence over that people, who in this particular are a sort of type both of the church and of individual believers. (Notes, Num. xxiii. 9. Deut. iv. 29—31. xxviii. 46. Jer. v. 15—18. xxx. 10, 11. Hos. iii. 4, 5.)

V. 11, 12. The Lord had for wise, righteous, and merciful reasons, brought Israel into a net, by inducing them to go down into Egypt, and settle in that country. Their oppressors, having thus entangled them, laid heavy burdens on their loins, using them like beasts of burden. Nay, they were so powerful, cruel, and haughty, that they seemed to ride over their heads; and, having thrown them down, to trample them under foot. (Notes, cxix. 1—3.) Yet from this situation, through fiery trials, through seas and rivers, God had brought them to rest and prosperity in Canaan. (Marg. Ref. Note, Is. xliii. 1, 2. Zech. xiii. 8, 9.)

V. 13, 14. The psalmist, having stirred up the people to praise God for his general mercies to Israel, avows his intention of celebrating, with sacrifices and oblations, those deliverances which he had lately received, both personal and public; and thus to perform the vows, which, in the most open and solemn manner, he had made, in the season of great danger and affliction. (Notes, xxii. 25. lvi. 12. cxvi. 17—19. Gen. xxviii. 20—22. xxxv. 1—3. Num. xxx. 1. Eccl. v. 5—7. Jonah i. 11—16.)

V. 15. This verse may be literally rendered, "I will offer unto thee the burnt-sacrifices of fatlings, even rams, with incense; I will prepare bullocks and goats;" that is, "I will liberally provide for every part of the service at the tabernacle."—"The incense of rams," conveys no clear meaning. (Note, Ex. xxx. 34—38.)

V. 16. The psalm, being given to the chief musician, was made public, and all might read it; but the psalmist especially called the attention of those who feared God, or were truly pious persons, to the concluding part; as they alone were prepared to enter into the spirit of it, to derive instruction from his experience, and to glorify God on his account. (Notes, 5, 6. Marg. Ref.)

V. 17. Extolled, &c. That dependence on God, and expectation from him, and those spiritual affections, which are employed in believing prayer, are honourable to his power, truth, and love; so that he is extolled or magnified by them. (Notes, xxx. 8—12. Marg. Ref.)

V. 18, 19. It is probable, that the psalmist had not only been reproached with his past transgressions, but also charged with hypocrisy, and a secret course of habitual sin; but the answer made to his prayers, 'brought along with it a testimony of his sincerity, far more valuable than his kingdom. For had he been guilty of such crimes, or entertained so much as a thought of them, as his enemies charged him withal, the Lord, who hates iniquity, would have denied his request.' (Bp. Patrick.)—The original is, "If I looked at iniquity with my heart;" that is, if I thought of it with affection and desire.—He that "regards iniquity," entertains the thoughts of it as a man does a welcome visitant. He provides for their entertainment, is reluctant to part with them; and, as far as he can safely, he seeks and seizes the occasion of practising the sin, which he thus thinks of with satisfaction. This evidences the love and dominion of sin; is inconsistent with true repentance; and, if connected with a profession of religion, it is a clear evidence of hypocrisy.—In this case God will not accept or answer a man's prayers. (Marg. Ref. Notes, Prov. xxviii. 9. Is. i. 10—15. John ix. 27—34.) But if the consciousness of sin in the heart, or the intrusion of evil thoughts, create uneasiness, and a desire to be rid of them; if they be like the presence of an impertinent intruding visitant, or that of a dun to a moneyless debtor; this is an argument of sincerity in repentance, faith, and regard to God and his will; and God delights in the prayer of the

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The glorious perfections and works of God should induce all men in every land to delight in praising him, in "singing forth the honour of his name, and in making his praise glorious;" accounting it their highest honour thus to adore and glorify him: and nothing but human depravity prevents this exercise from being as universal on earth as in heaven. But neither his exuberant goodness, nor his terrible judgments, nor the greatness of his power, can bring his enemies to more than a forced or feigned submission; except effectual grace new-create their hearts unto holiness. In this way, however, vast multitudes have been, by the gospel, brought to be his willing servants and spiritual worshippers, and at length all the inhabitants of the earth shall sing his praise.—It is very proper that sinners should be excited to "come, and behold the works of the Lord, and how terrible he is in his doing toward the children of men;" that, observing how "he ruleth by his power," over those who do not become his willing subjects; and how he beholds the nations, to hinder the rebellious from exalting themselves; they may see the necessity of seeking the favour of him whose wrath is so destructive; and, that, considering the deliverances vouchsafed his people, they may desire to share their privileges. His servants also should consider his wonderful works, that they may be excited to bless their God, and "cause the voice of his praise to be heard;" and in redemption by the death of Christ, and the glories which followed that grand event, they have more surprising and affecting subjects to contemplate, than Israel's deliverance from Egyptian bondage.—The Lord not only preserves our temporal life; but maintains that spiritual life which he hath communicated; nor will he suffer the feet of his servants to be moved, to their utter casting down, by any of the difficulties of their path, or assaults of their enemies. (Note, 1 Sam. ii. 9.) Yet he will try their faith, by affliction, as silver is tried in the fire; that it may be proved genuine, and be further purified. (Notes, 1 Pet. i. 6, 7. iv. 12—16.) Oppressions and persecutions, and even temptations, are on this account permitted as benefits to our souls; they indeed spring from the malice of men or devils; but we must receive them, as prescribed by our God to effect his gracious purposes.—Through various convictions, conflicts, and troubles, the slave of Satan escapes from his galling yoke, and obtains peace and joy in believing; and "through much tribulation" the believer "must enter into the kingdom of God."—Whilst our praises unite with those of the whole church of God, for general mercies vouchsafed from age to age; and our prayers for all that yet remains to be done; we must by no means overlook our own concerns. Under every trouble we should cry unto the Lord with our mouth and from our heart; and take occasion, from our distressing situation, more solemnly to engage ourselves to his service. Then he will deem himself honoured by our worship: and when we obtain deliverance, we must "pay the vows, which our mouth hath spoken in the day of our distress."—The sacrifice of the death of Christ hath superseded the legal oblations, with which the ancient believers expressed their grateful zeal; but we must offer continually the sacrifices of praise and thanksgiving; our bodies must be presented as a living sacrifice unto the Lord, while our souls are as consecrated priests to him; and without grudging we must expend our substance "in doing good," to our brethren, and to all men as we have opportunity; "for with such sacrifices our God is well pleased;" and the commemoration of the Redeemer's atoning sacrifice, according to his holy institution, is especially that sacrifice of thanksgiving, which is our bounden duty. Besides the general example of gratitude for our mercies, which we publicly exhibit; we should more particularly declare unto those who fear God, what he hath done for our souls, and how he hath heard and answered our prayers; they alone are capable of understanding, and will be edified and encouraged by our experience, and will join with us in prayer and praise; and this will turn to our mutual comfort, and to the glory of God. But without uprightness, in our professed repentance, faith, and love, we cannot share these spiritual privileges: if we love iniquity in our hearts, though we refrain from the gross practice of it, the Lord will reject our hypocritical supplications. But the feeblest petition of the repenting sinner, coming from a broken heart, will by no means be despised: and when we pray "in simplicity and godly sincerity," our requests will be evidently answered; and this will "turn unto us for a testimony," increasing our assurance of the Lord's love to us, and exciting our gratitude to him, who "hath not turned away our prayer, nor his mercy from us."

V. 21. The gifts received by the ascended Saviour, though for "rebellious" man, would not preserve such from destruction as went on still in their sins. The God of salvation, while he pardons and blesses the repenting rebel, is peculiarly terrible to the impenitent and unbelieving.—"The hairy scalp" means, the crown of the head, the principal strength, confidence, and glory of the enemy.—Christ will crush the serpent's head. (Notes, Gen. iii. 14, 15. Marg. Ref.)

V. 22, 23. The Lord had promised to save Israel from their enemies by the hand of David: he would therefore renew the wonders which he wrought, when Og, king of Bashan, was slain, and when the Egyptians perished at the Red Sea.—The ascension of Christ made way for most signal displays of the Lord's power, in spreading the gospel, and in taking vengeance on his enemies: and the more glorious prevalence of Christianity shall be attended with such slaughter of antichristian opposers, as will literally verify the words here used. (Marg. Ref. Notes, cxlix. 6—9. Is. xxxiv. lxiii. 1—6.)—As the verses follow the prophecy of our Lord's ascension, these events seem more directly predicted; and especially the conversion of the Jews, their restoration to their own land, and the vengeance on those who shall oppose them. (Notes, Ez. xxxviii. xxxix.)

V. 24, 25. When the solemnity of the day was nearly finished, these verses seem to have been sung. The congregation had been spectators of the triumphant manner, in which their God and King had gone up, to take possession of his sanctuary, attended with sacred music and rejoicing: He had accepted their services; and all was so happily concluded, as to presage future prosperous days. (Notes, xxiv. 7—10. 1 Chr. xv. 16—24. xvi. 4—6. 37—43.) Thus the prophecy of the Son of David, (the King of kings and Lord of lords,) going forth to destroy his enemies and enlarge his kingdom, is introduced by a vision of "much people in heaven, saying Allelujah, Salvation, and glory, and honour, and power unto the Lord our God, &c." (Notes, Rev. xix.) A scene not wholly unlike, but immensely more august, than that procession with the ark to mount Zion, which was the pledge of David's future victories and prosperity.—My God, my King. (24) (cxlv. 1.)—Damsels. (25.) (Notes, 11, 12. cxlviii. 11—14. Jer. xxxi. 3—5. 12—14.)—The triumphant entrance of the ascending Saviour, amidst the loud acclamations of the heavenly hosts, is shadowed forth under these images.

V. 26. From, &c. That is, 'Ye, who spring from the "fountain" or the stock, of Israel.' Thus the people in companies seem responsively to have called upon each other, to bless the Lord.

V. 27. The tribe of Benjamin, from which Saul, the first king of Israel, sprang, joined in this solemnity, as willingly subject to David; and, though a small tribe, descended from Jacob's youngest son, and now eclipsed by Judah, whose princes supported David by their counsels, or, multitudes, it manifested no jealousy or envy. Not only the rulers of the other tribes in the vicinity of Jerusalem attended on this occasion, but those of Zebulun and Naphtali which lay most remote: so harmonious was the whole nation on this occasion! (Notes, 1 Chr. xii. 22—40. xiii. 1—5.) Thus after Christ's ascension, rival nations and people, near and far off, thronged into his church.

V. 28. The people seem here to have addressed the king. The Lord his God, had commanded all parties thus to strengthen David's cause, and had effected their willing submission; and they prayed, that he would establish what he had by him wrought for his people, in preserving the unity of the nation, and increasing its prosperity. (Notes, cxxxviii. 8. Eph. iii. 20, 21. Phil. i. 3—6.)

V. 29. The word rendered "temple" is used for the tabernacle; (1 Sam. iii. 3.) yet it is probable, that David spoke this prophetically, and foretold that the temple, which was to be built at Jerusalem, would render the worship there performed so much known, that kings would bring presents and oblations to JEHOVAH, to be offered there. This was a figure of the conversion of the kings of the earth unto Christ in the latter days. (Notes, lxxii. 8—11. Ezra vii. 12—25. Is. xlix. 22, 23. lx. 6—14.)

V. 30. The same word is here rendered company, which is before translated "congregation," but which signifies a living creature; (Note, 9, 10:) and it seems in this place to mean a wild beast.—The whole verse may be thus rendered: 'Rebuke the wild beast of the reeds, the congregation of the mighty, among the calves of the nations skipping or exulting with pieces of silver; scatter the people that delight in war.' (Horne.) Some interpret "the beast of the reed" to mean the crocodile, the emblem of Egypt; and the "calves of the nations," the objects of the Egyptian idolatry; while their "skipping with pieces of silver," is supposed to refer to the rites of their worship. As, however, David was not attacked by the Egyptians, or about to make war on them, this interpretation is not very satisfactory.—"The beast of the reed" or lance, seems to denote a warrior, fierce as a wild beast, perhaps Hadadezer, king of Syria. "The multitude of the bulls and the calves of the people" were the powerful and numerous commanders, with their troops; and I apprehend the prayer is, 'O Lord, rebuke them, enraged and strong as they are, till they lay themselves down for us to set our feet on their necks, and supplicate their lives, offering pieces of silver for tribute, as owning themselves subject to us. Yea, "scatter the people that delight in war," as they evidently do.' (Notes, 2 Sam. viii. x.) The word rendered, "submit themselves," means the most unreserved humiliation. It is used only here and Prov. vi. 3; where it is rendered, "Humble thyself." It is no doubt to be considered also as a typical prophecy and prayer of the church for a decided victory, over the most furious and haughty of her oppressors and persecutors. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 31—33. The victories gained by David and Israel over the surrounding nations would induce even those who were more distant, and most addicted to idolatry, to come to Jerusalem, and join themselves to the worshippers of the true God. (Marg. Ref.) The conversion of the nations, in consequence of the judgments of God on the opposers of the gospel in the primitive times, and before the millennium, is evidently foretold: for the kingdoms of the earth are called upon to join in the praises of Israel; and to adore him who rode on the heavens to the help of his people, (Note, Deut. xxxiii. 26;) and who spake with a mighty voice to them from mount Sinai.—When the Messiah ascended on high, to "the glory which he had with his Father before the world was," he sent forth the powerful word of his gospel, calling on all men to submit to him, "and honour him "even as they honoured the Father that sent him."—Ethiopia, &c. (31.) The Ethiopians shall hasten with their willing oblations to the God of Israel. As connected with Egypt, it is probable that Ethiopia in Africa is meant. The land of negroes. (Notes, Acts viii. 26—40.) This may encourage our efforts and prayers for the conversion of the much injured Africans.

V. 34, 35. All the perfections of God, which are his excellency, concur in protecting his church. The power which made the clouds, and rules the highest heavens, is exerted in behalf of his people, and communicated to them "out of his holy places;" the sanctuary of old, as the type of "heaven itself," "whither the forerunner is for us entered;" and whence especially he is terrible to his enemies. (Notes, xxix. 1—11. cxi. 9, 10. cxlviii. 13, 14. Deut. xxxiii. 27—29.)—Blessed, &c. (35.) (Notes, xli. 11—13. lxxii. 17—19. Eph. i. 3—8.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—17. When God arises to plead 'the cause of his people, the confederated power of those who hate him will be dissipated and dissolved; and at length all the wicked will perish at his presence. The same displays of his power and glory will rejoice the righteous; and words cannot express the cause which they have, and ever will have, to triumph in their unchangeable friend, and to celebrate his praises. His condescension is equal to his majesty: he always patronizes the afflicted and oppressed; and poor sinners, helpless and exposed more than any fatherless children, are readily admitted among his sons and daughters, and share all the blessings of that high relation. Indeed all the company of his chosen were once bound in Satan's chains, and employed in a baser drudgery than that of making bricks; and far more wretched and

David, as the type of Christ, mingles doleful complaints with fervent prayers for himself and his people, 1—21. He in the Redeemer's name devotes his enemies to destruction, 22—29. He engages to praise and bless God, calls on the whole creation to join him, and predicts the enlargement and prosperity of the church, 30—36.

abject, than the Israelites in Egypt. But when he comes to break off their chains, and claim them for his own, he leads them forth to liberty, to victory, and to eternal glory. They are made willing to follow him, and he goes before them; heaven and earth concur in supplying their wants, and promoting their salvation: difficulties in their path only make way for their almighty friend to shew his care of them: he guides and guards them; he feeds their souls with the bread of heaven, and gives them the waters of life to drink: and, whilst he graciously prepares for the souls of "the poor in spirit," he will not withhold what is needful for their bodies. They reap the benefit of the Redeemer's victories; and, fighting under his banner, and by his word of command, they profit by the assaults of every enemy; until complete salvation render those white as snow in Salmon," and beautiful beyond all that is lovely in the visible creation, who once were most mean and loathsome, through the guilt and defilement of their sins.

V. 18—35. The death of our Redeemer was the price of all the blessings which he confers on sinners, and his resurrection and ascension made way for his conferring them on mankind. When he ascended on high, our God declared his church of ransomed sinners to be his residence, which he greatly desired and delighted in; whilst in its exalted Head "all the fulness of the Godhead dwelteth bodily." He now reigns over heaven, and earth, and hell, with unlimited authority. In vain do kings or nations envy or oppose his sovereignty; all must submit, or be destroyed by him; and his wrath is more dreadful from mount Zion than it was from mount Sinai. Having led our oppressors captive, "he hath received gifts for rebellious man," which he never refuses to those who humbly sue for them; and they who partake of them become thenceforth "an habitation of God, through the Spirit." The gifts of his written word, and of the ministry of his gospel, are vouchsafed to our land. He gave the word, great was the multitude of those who published it; and they have been raised up successively even to the present day: may he give commandment that thousands more may be raised up, to go forth and preach the gospel in every part of the earth! And may we, may all the inhabitants of Britain, profit by our peculiar privileges! If we have embraced from our hearts this proffered mercy, let us "bless the Lord who daily loadeth us with benefits." "Our God is the God of salvation: he hath quickened us when dead in sin, and will not leave us till he hath brought us to glory, honour, and eternal life. But he will crush the serpent's head, and utterly destroy all those who go on still in their trespasses: for his mercies to his church will be attended with judgment on his enemies, till the complete salvation of the one be accompanied with the final ruin of the other.—And as our Lord and King condescends to come and dwell among his people, let us observe the tokens of his presence; and let all, of every rank, age, and sex, concur in blessing his name; for union and harmony are the stability of the church.—All our strength is in and from the Lord; and if he has begun to communicate his grace to our souls, we may pray in faith, that he would daily stablish that which he hath wrought for and in us. May he speedily so strengthen his cause upon earth, that all the proud, idolatrous, and oppressive, all that delight in war, or maintain opposition to his church, may be scattered and brought down; that all kings and nations may share the blessings of his gospel, and sing praises to his name. May these predictions be fulfilled in their most extensive meaning, that all the inhabitants of the world may adore and rejoice in "his excellency over Israel;" and that he may no longer be terrible to any of them out of his holy places! And whilst all unite in ascribing power and dominion unto him, may all experience strength communicated from him, enabling them to resist temptation, and to overcome every enemy of their salvation. (Notes, cxxxviii. 3. 2 Cor. xii. 7—10. Eph. iii. 16—19. Phil. iv. 10—13. Col. i. 10—13.) that one nation may call upon another to bless the Lord, and all on earth may form one general chorus, like that of angels in heaven, continually saying, with alacrity and gratitude, "Blessed be God," even "the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ," throughout all ages, for evermore.

NOTES.

PSALM LXIX. V. 1—3. It is probable that David, in great distress during Absalom's rebellion, composed this psalm with reference to his own case: but the Holy Spirit evidently spoke "of the sufferings of Christ, and the glory that followed." (Note, 1 Pet. i. 10—12.) Indeed it is so manifest a prophecy of Christ, that we should consider him as the speaker in most parts of it.—In these verses he compares himself to a man sinking in the mire, whilst the floods of waters go over his head. (Notes, 14, 15. xl. 1—5. xlii. 6—8. lxxxviii. 6—9. Marg. Ref.) His sufferings from the hands of wicked men, from the powers of hell beneath, and from the justice of the Father, whilst external torment united with internal agony to enhance his distress, were thus represented with peculiar propriety. He continued to cry for help, till his throat was parched with thirst, and his eyes grew dim and failed in the agonies of death: whilst, in perfect faith and patience, but in the extremity of conflict, he waited for his God to deliver him. (Notes, Matt. xxvi. 36—46. xxvii. 46—50. John xix. 28—30. Gal. iii. 6—14. Heb. 7—10.)

V. 4. The multitudes who hated the Lord Jesus without a cause, nay, though his miracles of unmingled mercy merited their most grateful love, and who demanded his crucifixion, could not be numbered. The rulers of the Jews and of the Romans, who had all the power in their hands, combined to destroy him, being his enemies wrongfully. Then did he make restitution for our robbery and satisfaction for our crimes, and restored that honour to the Divine law which he had not taken away. (Notes, vii. 3—5. xxv. 2, 3. Matt. xxvii. 19—25. John xv. 22—25.)—David indeed was hated wrongfully, and in many things received from his right: but the whole, and especially the concluding words, were far more emphatically verified in Christ. (Notes, Is. liii. 4—7. Zech. xiii. 7. 1 Pet. ii. 18—25.)

V. 5. "O God, the righteous Judge, I make my appeal to thee, who knowest the very worst of me; and protest that, whatever my mistakes, or my wilful sins, may have been, I never did them any injury, nor gave them any cause to persecute me." (Bp. Patrick.)—The words, as spoken by David, have no difficulty: yet they may be considered as an appeal to the heart-searching God for his general integrity, as well as a confession of folly and sin in many instances.—If applied to the Lord Jesus, as spoken by him, they must be interpreted of our folly and iniquity being imputed to him, as the debt which he had not contracted, but was required to pay; the robbery which he had not committed, but was made answerable for. (Note 4.) Thus many expositors understand the verse: though perhaps it should be explained as the language of the type, rather than of the antitype.

V. 6, 7. These verses may be explained either as a prayer, or prediction; being in the future tense. David prayed, that his sufferings might not prove an occasion of sin, or discouragement, to his pious brethren; because he was persecuted and reproached, not for his crimes, but for his religion. Thus St. Paul earnestly desired that the Ephesians might not faint, because of his sufferings on their account. (Note, Eph. iii. 13, 14.) But the case of our Lord's disciples, of those who "trusted that it was he that should redeem Israel;" while they witnessed the contempt and cruelty which he endured, and the ignominious death which he submitted to, and while he lay in the grave, seems most emphatically described. He, however, foretold, that their sorrow should be turned into joy; being assured, that "he suffered the just for the unjust, that he might bring us to God." (Notes, xxxii. 6—8. xxxv. 25—28. Is. i. 5, 6. liii. 2—6. Heb. xii. 2, 3.)

V. 8, 9. The Lord Jesus "came to his own, but his own received him not;" his countrymen called him "a Samaritan, who had a devil;" "neither did his brethren believe in him;" and the inhabitants of Nazareth, where he had been brought up, attempted to destroy him. Because his zeal for the honour of the law, and the purity of the worship of God, which entirely occupied his soul, and raised him above all inferior considerations; and his plain reproofs of hypocrisy and iniquity, exasperated the mercenary and worthless teachers and rulers of the Jews, and set all orders of men against him. In calumniating him, they ascribed the miracles, which he wrought by the Spirit of God, to Beelzebub; and in many ways they reproached God, in reproaching his beloved Son, who was "the express image of his person;" for "they both saw and hated both him and his Father."—As two apostles have quoted this verse with express application to Christ; we are warranted in explaining it as a direct prophecy of him, or even as his words. (Note, lxxxix. 50, 51. John ii. 14—17. vii. 3—10. Rom. xv. 1—3.)—Yet the usage which David experienced from his son Absalom, his relations, his counsellors, and his subjects, chiefly because of his zeal for the honour of God and true religion, rendered him a striking type of Christ in this respect, and doubtless occasioned this complaint. (Note, xxxi. 10—13. lxxxviii. 6—9. Job xix. 5, 6. Jer. xv. 15—18.)

V. 10—12. "The Lord of glory" voluntarily became a "man of sorrows." "In the likeness of sinful flesh," and as a poor man, he appeared in the habit of humiliation, as if he had been a penitent in sackcloth. He wept, and fasted, and prayed; and he was despised and reproached for it. He was called "a Samaritan, who had a devil," "a Nazarene," and "this deceiver;" and he was made a byword and a proverb to the people. (Marg. Ref.)—The chief priests and rulers, who sat as judges in the gate, with deliberate malice conspired his death: and the very drunkards profanely made songs of him, and diverted themselves amidst their intemperate revels, by reviling and ridiculing him. (Bp. Patrick.)—When the Redeemer was enduring his extremest sufferings, that he might glorify God and save the souls of his people, it was an acceptable time for his prayers in behalf of himself and them. Through him it is an acceptable time for our prayers, when his gospel is preached to us, and his Spirit is striving with us. (Notes. Is. xlix. 7, 8. 2 Cor. vi. 1, 2. Heb. v. 7-10. Marg. Ref.)

V. 14, 15. The original, beginning with the language of prayer, and proceeding in that of assured confidence, by a change of the imperative for the future, has great animation: "Deliver me from the mire, and I shall not sink: I shall be delivered from those that hate me," &c. This expression explains the meaning of the figurative language in these verses, and in the beginning of the psalm. (Note. 1-2.)—They contain the prayer and expectation of the Redeemer, in the depth of his humiliation, when his enemies and sufferings seemed about entirely to overwhelm him: but he knew that his soul would not be left in the place of separate spirits, nor his body in the grave to see corruption; but that his resurrection and exaltation would make way for him to accomplish his purposes of love. (Note. xvi. 8-11. Marg. Ref.)

V. 16-20. To understand, and be suitably affected, with these verses, it is peculiarly necessary to compare them with the history, given by the Evangelists, of our Lord's agony in the garden, and his sufferings on the cross.—In the garden, "his soul was exceeding sorrowful, even unto death," and in his agony "he prayed more earnestly:" but so far from having any one to console with him or comfort him, the apostles themselves "could not watch with him one hour."—Having then been betrayed by Judas, denied by Peter, and forsaken by all, he was nailed to the cross, surrounded by his cruel enemies, who reproached and insulted him to the utmost: and in this extremity he exclaiming also, "My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?" He had not at this crisis the comfort of his Father's manifested lovingkindness, which he knew to be good, yea, better than life: but "he hid his face from him." And while he suffered for sinners, that the "multitude of God's mercies" might be shewn to them, he was excluded from mercy; men shewed him no mercy, and he was smitten with the sword of Divine justice. But he prayed with strong crying and tears; and he was heard speedily, and rescued from his foes and from death. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 21. The word rendered "gall," signifies anything either poisonous or exceedingly bitter. (Note. Deut. xxix. 18. Jer. viii. 14-16. Acts viii. 18-24.)—The literal accomplishment of this verse, in the case of our Lord, is one instance out of many, of the particularity with which the circumstances of his passion were described by "holy men of God, who spake as they were moved by the Holy Ghost." (Preface to Psalms, 1 page, Note, xxii. 16-18.) But the vinegar and the gall were but a feeble emblem of that bitter cup which he exhausted, that we might drink "the cup of salvation." (Notes, Matt. xxvii. 32-34. Mark xv. 23. Marg. Ref.)

V. 22-28. Some commentators read this awful passage entirely in the future tense, as a prediction, and not an imprecation: but most of the verbs are in the imperative; and the apostles quote the passage as an imprecation. (Notes, Acts i. 20-22. Rom. xi. 7-10.) If we consider the passage as the language of Christ, denouncing the doom of his implacable enemies, and as recorded for a warning to others; no reasonable objection can be made to this interpretation: for in reading them, we only assent to the justice of the sentence. (Note, Deut. xxvii. 15.)—As our example, Christ on the cross prayed for his crucifiers; and his prayer was answered in the conversion of numbers of them: but, being exalted upon his throne, he asks of the Father, and receives from him, authority to break in pieces with his iron rod all obstinate opposers, as well as to save all humble supplicants. (Note, ii. 7-9.) The case of the Jewish nation is here prophetically described. Not only were their temporal advantages made an occasion of mischief to them, but, depending on those sacrifices and institutions which were originally appointed for the good of their souls, and ensnared in their own counsels, they persisted both in enmity to Christ, and in resistance to the Romans. Being shut up in Jerusalem, when they were assembled to eat the passover, "their table became their snare;" infatuated beyond all example, and disunited among themselves, the horrors of intestine massacres weakened and terrified them: at length the Romans, the instruments of the Lord's indignation, got possession of the city with most dreadful slaughter, destroyed the temple, (the palace here mentioned, Marg. Ref.) and desolated their city and habitations, so that none of them were left to dwell there. The remnant of the nation were cast out of the church, and left in judicial darkness, to add "iniquity to iniquity," without obtaining an interest "in the righteousness of God." Thus they have been blotted out of the register in which the people of God were enrolled, and were no longer "written among the righteous;" and all this was laid on them for rejecting and crucifying the Messiah with the most determined contempt and cruelty. The twenty-fifth verse is applied by St. Peter to the traitor Judas, "who was guide to them that took Jesus;" and thus a proper representative of the apostate but hypocritical nation, which as with one voice demanded, even while celebrating the passover, the crucifixion of their Prince and Saviour.—But, the original word rendered habitation, meaning a palace, the destruction of the temple, the pride of the nation, seems also predicted: and when our Lord said, "Your house is left unto you desolate;" he may be supposed to have referred to this passage. (Note, Matt. xxiii. 27-29.)—The twenty-second psalm, after predicting the sufferings of Christ, closes with the triumphs of his gospel; (Notes, xxii. 19-31;) but this first denounces the ruin of his enemies. Some render the words, translated "add iniquity unto their iniquity;" "add punishment to their iniquity;" and the marginal references will shew, that to be given up to wickedness is the punishment often, in awful justice, awarded to obstinate transgressors. (Notes, v. 10, 11. cix. 6-20.)—"It were to be wished," (says Bp. Horne on the twenty-sixth verse,) "that the sorrows of the penitent, when wounded with a sense of sin, never subjected him to the scorn and contempt of those who would be thought Christians."

V. 29. (Notes, xxii. 6. xl. 17.)—Let, &c. Or, "Thy salvation, O God, shall set me up on high." (Notes, lxxxviii. 1, 2. cxi. 14-16.) Thus the Saviour, in the depth of his passion and humiliation, anticipates his exaltation "far above all heavens, that he might fill all things." (Notes, Eph. i. 15-23. Phil. ii. 9-11.)

V. 30, 31. 'Here, as in the twenty-second, and many other psalms, the scene changes from sorrow to joy; from suffering to triumph; from the passion to the resurrection.' (Bp. Horne.)—The praises of the great Redeemer and of his redeemed church; and indeed his whole work, with the eternal glory thence redounding to the God of salvation, are far more acceptable to him than the sacrifices of the law ever had been in themselves: but when the Jews rejected Christ, and preferred their sacrifices; these, even though clean animals offered according to the law, became abominable; being a declaration of their unbelief, and their refusal to "submit to the righteousness of God." (Notes, xl. 6—8. l. 7—15. 20—23. Is. lvi. 3, 4. Heb. x. 5—10. 26, 27.)

V. 32. (Notes, xxii. 26. 29.) The meek and humble, hearing of the Saviour's sufferings and exaltation, will rejoice; and the souls of all that seek the Lord, shall through his atonement be made partakers of life spiritual and eternal.—In how many millions of instances hath this already been fulfilled! (Notes, 1 Chr. xvi. 10, 11. Is. lv. 6—9.)

V. 33. His prisoners. Those who are bound in prison, as enslaved to sin, and condemned for their crimes, when awakened, (by God's preventing grace as his elect,) to seek deliverance, shall not be despised; but on the contrary shall, through the Redeemer's intercession, be brought into "the glorious liberty of the children of God."—Some explain the words, of those who were cast into prison, by such as persecuted the preachers of the gospel, and those who followed them. V. 35, 36. Zion seems to denote the church at large; the city of Judah, the several divisions of the church throughout the world; evangelical blessings being predicted under allusions taken from the then existing state of things. (Notes, Is. lx. 4—7. lvi. 19—23. Ez. xl. 2. Heb. xli. 18—21.)—God will preserve his church, and every sound part of it, and all true Christians; continuing to them, and entailing on their posterity, the blessings of the new covenant.—Yea, all that love God shall dwell for ever in Zion, in the church militant on earth, without being finally overcome by any enemy, and in the church triumphant in heaven.—Perhaps the future conversion of the Jews also was here foretold. (Notes, xxiii. 30, 31. Is. liii. 9—12. lxx. 8—10. Jer. xlviii. 17—26.)

V. 1.—21. It behoves us carefully to examine, whether the things which pertain to the Lord Jesus form as important a part of our religion, as they do of the holy Scriptures: and, whether our judgment, experience, and affections, are, as it were, imbued with them, as the word of God is in all its parts: that, whilst the prophecies, as compared with the accomplishment, confirm our belief that the Bible is a divine revelation; our hope may rest on the foundation laid, and our conduct be influenced by the motives proposed in it.—We cannot too often be called to contemplate the scene, here again presented to our minds. We should frequently consider the person of the sufferer spoken of; and enquire wherefore, as well as what, he suffered: that, beholding the Son of God incarnate; overwhelmed by his inexpressible sorrows; bereft of comfort; seeming in vain to cry for relief; conflicting with Satan's horrid temptations, and even bearing the wrath of God for us; that, viewing him hated without cause, and apparently left in the power of cruel enemies, treated as a stranger and alien by his brethren and people, reproached, insulted, derided, condemned by the rulers, and made the sport of the soldiers and the vilest of the multitude; betrayed, denied, or forsaken by his disciples; nailed to the cross, and mocked, when athirst, with vinegar mingled with gall, to drink: that meditating, I say, on these scenes, we may be led to deeper humiliation for sin, to a greater admiration of the justice and mercy of our God, a higher valuation of our immortal souls, a clearer conviction of our danger, and the vanity of every other dependence, except on his great atonement; a fuller perception of our infinite obligations to our gracious Redeemer, and a more lively gratitude and love constraining us to live to his glory. Let us further learn hence, to expect the enmity of the many and the mighty, of our relatives, and of those whom we have most served. We may perhaps plead that they "hate us wrongfully and without cause;" but our foolishness and our sins are not hid from God; and, alas! they too often appear to man, and give malice that occasion which it sought against us. We need not, however, be discouraged, when reproached and put to shame for the Lord's sake; if our zeal for the truths, precepts, and worship of God, in some small measure resembling that of our Redeemer, should disgust and exasperate our neighbours, and make our former friends

PSALM LXX.

David prays for speedy help, to the confusion of his foes, and the triumph of the righteous, 1-5.

To the chief Musician, A Psalm of David, <sup>to bring</sup> to remembrance.

MAKE haste, <sup>b</sup>O God, to deliver me; make haste *to help me, O LORD.

2 °Let them be ashamed and confounded that seek after my soul : let them °be turned backward, and put to confusion, that desire my hurt.

3 Let them be turned <sup>e</sup>back for a reward of their shame, that say, <sup>f</sup>Aha, aha.

4 ¶ Let all those that seek thee rejoyce and be glad in thee : and let such as love thy salvation say continually, Let God be magnified.

5 But <sup>h</sup>I am poor and needy : make haste unto me,
O God : thou art my help and my deliverer ; <sup>i</sup>O LORD,

treat us as strangers : if they, whose words and works reproach the Lord, should despise and revile us for his sake : if even judges and rulers should speak against us ; and if " drunkards should make songs of us," and turn our godly sorrow, our tenderness of conscience, our deadness to the world, and even our prayers for them, into derision and mockery. Whatever deep waters of affliction or temptation we are sinking into ; whatever floods of trouble, or ungodly men, seem ready to overwhelm us ; we should persevere in prayer, and in waiting on our God to save us ; though we be weary, and as it were hoarse, with crying for help, and our eyes be ready to fail with looking for deliverance : and the more men despise and desert us, the more earnest should be our cries unto the Lord to help and comfort us. Such extremities will be found acceptable times of approach to God, if we plead with him the multitude of his mercies, and the truth of those promises, which secure the believer's salvation : but we should in these emergencies remember others, who seek the Lord ; and pray for them, that they may not be ashamed or discouraged, through our afflictions, or misconduct.—He who brought the Redeemer from the grave, and exalted him above all his enemies, will hear those who come in his name : he will deliver them out of temptation and affliction : and with his refreshing loving-kindness he will turn unto them and comfort them, and that speedily : and he will at length receive their souls, and raise their bodies from the grave, and thus rescue them from every enemy. Indeed reproach and contempt are hard to bear, and fill our hearts with heaviness ; and we may, at some times, look in vain for compassion or comfort from our fellow-creatures. But the Redeemer exhausted that cup of wrath, which contained nothing but vinegar and gall ; and he will infuse sweetness into all our sorrows. We need not therefore fear suffering with or for him.

V. 22—36. Now in this acceptable time," we should fear coming short of the salvation set before us; and lest any of us should suffer, as the enemies of Christ, from his awful indignation. For many, besides the nation of the Jews, have had their table made their snare, and the things which should have been for their welfare, a trap to them; because they have opposed, or neglected this salvation: many are given up to judicial blindness, and to desperation: the not displeasure of God pursues them from their habitation on earth; and, being "driven away in their wickedness," they "add iniquity to iniquity," and that for ever; for they are "blotted out of the book of the living, and are not written among the righteous." Let us then fear lest this should be our case, and be careful not to "persecute those, whom God hath smitten; or to speak to the grief of those, whom he hath wounded." Let us call upon the Lord in the present acceptable time, without further delay; and then, though we be not only poor and sorrowful, but guilty and defiled, "the salvation of God will set us up on high." And not only the atonement of the Redeemer, but the praises of the redeemed, who "magnify the name of the Lord with thanksgiving," are more "pleasing to him than bullocks with horns and hoofs." The humble will perceive and rejoice in these encouraging truths, and the souls of those, who seek the Lord according to this blessed gospel, shall live for ever. Through our exalted Advocate, he will hear the prayers of those who have been the prisoners of Satan, when they long for liberty and salvation; and he will not despise the poorest or the vilest who trust in him." "Let then heaven and earth praise him, the seas and every thing that moveth therein;" for God will protect and save his church, and enlarge her borders; that his people may dwell there, and have it in possession. He will bless them and their children after them; "a seed shall serve him on earth," and his servants shall inherit his heavenly kingdom; and they that love his name, shall dwell before him for ever. "He that spared not his own Son, but delivered him up for us all; how shall he not with him also freely give us all things?"

NOTES.

PSALM LXX. V. 1-5. (Notes, xl. 13-17.) This psalm is, for substance, the same as the concluding verses of the fortieth psalm; yet there are verbal alterations in every part of it, though none that materially affect the sense.—Turned back, &c. (3.) “Be desolate.” (xl. 15.)—After “poor and needy,” is added; “yet the Lord thinketh of me.” For “O LORD;” “O my God.” (Note, xix. 29.)—Some think, that it was parted from the fortieth psalm, (with some variation,) as suggesting general hints for prayer to pious persons, under very afflictive circumstances.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

No worldly possessions or distinctions can prevent the humbled sinner from feeling himself to be poor and needy; hence his entire dependence upon a merciful God, and his fervent applications to him on all occasions; whilst the proud can only pray formally and hypocritically. (Notes, Matt. v. 3. Luke had long served God, and been useful to Israel; but he was not capable of such services as he had been formerly; and his rebellious son, and ungrateful people, rejected and despised his authority. He was, however, fully persuaded that God, who had favoured and helped him all his life long, would not cast him off in his old age. (Notes, 18, 19. Is. xlvii. 3, 4.)

V. 10, 11. Absalom, Ahitophel, and the other conspirators, while they consulted together to destroy David, may be supposed to have excused their own detestable wickedness, by charging him with many real or supposed crimes; and it is probable, they spoke most virulently of his conduct in respect of Bathsheba and Uriah. Persuading themselves, therefore, that David had by that scandalous wickedness, forfeited the Divine protection; which they could not deny that he had formerly enjoyed, when he slew Goliath, was delivered from Saul, and made victorious over the surrounding nations; they concluded that God had forsaken him, and that they might proceed in persecuting him, with confidence of success, for there was now no deliverer. (Notes, iv. 2. xli. 4—8. xlii. 9, 10.) But David, while submissively enduring the correction of his heavenly Father, was conscious that he had deeply repented, and had obtained forgiveness. He was also aware, that impious contempt of God united with enmity to himself, in the conduct of his foes: and thence he deduced arguments to strengthen his assurance, that God would for his own glory rescue his persecuted servant from his impious persecutors.—They who consulted to put our Lord to death, and tried to find accusations against him, could not but own that he had wrought many miracles; yet when they prevailed so far as to get him nailed to the cross, they insulted him, as if God had finally forsaken him. (Notes, Matt. xxvii. 39—44. John xi. 47, 48.)

V. 12. 'O my God, who hast hitherto so wonderfully preserved me, let this vain confidence and insulting language of my subjects incline thee to make the greater speed to relieve me.' (Bp. Patrick.) The first clause is future, 'Thou wilt not be far from me; haste thee to help me.' As if David had said: 'I know that thou wilt not finally forsake me; but the extremity of my case makes me earnest for speedy deliverance.' (Notes, xxxix. 18—22.)

V. 13-15. These verses throughout are in the future tense, the language of prediction, or confident expectation, and not necessarily of imprecation. It might not be so material to observe this, if many had not taken occasion from the latter interpretation, to charge "the man after God's own heart" with malevolence and a revengeful spirit; and to represent the Old Testament as sanctioning such a spirit, though unsuitable to the evangelical dispensation. Nay, some very pious and respectable persons have admitted charges of this kind, to a very great extent; but they are highly dishonourable to God. His perfections and commandments, his holiness, and the sanctifying work of the Holy Spirit, are unchangeably the same. And there is no reason to think, that David had recorded one prayer in the Psalms, which St. Paul would in similar circumstances have scrupled. When he saith, as the type of Christ, or by the Spirit of prophecy, he might very properly either predict or denounce destruction on those, who persisted in opposing him; as the apostle says, "If any man love not the Lord Jesus Christ, let him be Anathema Maran-atha." Notes, 1 Cor. xvi. 22—24. 2 Tim. iv. 14—15. And when he was engaged in devotion or meditation, he might, in assured faith, foresee the ruin of his own wicked persecutors, such as Saul and Ahitophel, and even pray for their confusion, as the apostle said of Alexander the coppersmith, "The Lord reward him according to his works;" being fully persuaded that he was given over to a reprobate mind, and if not restrained would do a great deal of mischief to the church of God. (Notes, v. 10, 11. xxxv. 4—9. xl. 14, 15. lxix. 22—23. cix. 6—20.)—"Because thy benefits to me are innumerable, I cannot but continually meditate on and rehearse them." (Notes, 8. v. 22—24. xl. 1—5. 9, 10. cxxxix. 17, 18. cxlv. 9—13. ls. xlv. 20—25.)

V. 16. The psalmist, in the sharp and perilous contest in which he was engaged, determined to trust in the power of God for deliverance; and to "mention his righteousness alone."—He had not deserved, from his son and subjects, the ill usage which he received from them: he would not, however,

PSALM LXXIII.

The psalmist, assured that God is good to his people, shews that his faith had almost failed, on seeing the prosperity of the wicked, 1—14. He overcomes the temptation by learning their dreadful end, 15—20. He, with deep humility, avows his unreserved dependence on God, and determines to cleave to him, expecting present support and future glory, 21—28.

NOTES.

PSALM LXXIII. Title. This, and several of the following psalms, are ascribed to Asaph, in the same mode of expression by which others are described to David, (Marg. Ref.) yet some think that David wrote them, and only delivered them to Asaph to be set to music, or sung ; while others think that another Asaph, in later ages, wrote some of them.

V. 1. The psalmist, after much consideration, and a sharp contest with temptation, thus abruptly expressed his assurance that, notwithstanding appearances, the Lord was kind to his true people, who served him in uprightness of heart.—The same distinction between an Israelite by nation, and the true Israelite, which is often made in the New Testament, is here explicitly established. (Notes, Matt. v. 8. John i. 47—51. Rom. ii. 25—29.)

V. 2, 3. (Notes, xxxvii. 1, 2, 5—8. xciv. 16—18. Jer. xii. 1—3.)

V. 4. Wicked men often spend their lives without much sickness, and end them without great pain : whilst many pious persons scarcely know what health is, and die with great sufferings. Nay, numbers of the wicked are so hardened in presumption, that they die without terror or remorse. (Notes, xvii. 13—15. Job xxi. 7—22. xxiv. 18—20.) The original may be rendered, "They have no hands till their death." They are not put in chains for execution, like condemned criminals ; but are let alone, till they are taken out of the world like other men.—"There is neither pangs of body, nor remorse and terror of soul, in their death." (Bp. Hall.)

V. 5. 'The wealthy sinner, far from poverty, and free from disease, seems to pass his days exempted from the miseries of mankind, without labour and anxiety ; and not so much as to think of those who, distressed on all sides, can scarcely earn their bread by the sweat of their brows.' (Horne.) (Notes, Heb. xii. 4—13.)

V. 6—9. The haughtiness of these prosperous ungodly men appeared in their external decorations ; nay, they counted that display of their pride, which is falsely called magnificence, their highest ornament ; as conquerors, and other eminent persons, wore chains of gold round their necks for decoration and distinction. (Marg. Ref.) At the same time, their whole conduct was so notorious for violence and oppression, that they were covered with them as with a garment. Perhaps it is also implied, that their violence bore the expense of their ostentation, which they gratified in rich garments and costly ornaments. They likewise indulged and pampered their bodies, in the most luxurious manner : and their looks discovered their excessive sensuality and voluptuousness. Yet they reserved more from their enormous expenses, than a wise man would wish for ; or more than they formerly could have thought of : such unexpected success attended them !—But, instead of being thankful for their abundance, their corrupt passions were thus exceedingly strengthened and inflamed ; and, so far from restraining, or concealing them, they openly gloried in them ; avowing their designs and politic methods of oppressing the poor, and crushing opposition ; despising the laws of man, and even those of almighty God ; and haughtily uniting to their licentious, selfish, and unfeeling conversation, the language of infidelity or atheism ; saying not "within themselves" but openly, "I neither fear God, nor regard man ;" thus setting the Judge of the world at defiance, and propagating far and wide their pernicious and impious principles. (Notes, 1 Sam. ii. 3. Job xxi. 7—16. xxii. 15—20. Marg. Ref.)—Alas ! how many are there in modern times, who seem to have sat for the odious and detestable portrait here exhibited !—A circle of fawning dependents is never wanting, to whom the vain and ignorant wretch, exalted in his own conceit above the level of mortality, may, from their chair, without control, dictate libertinism and infidelity. (Horne.)

V. 10. This verse is generally allowed to be very difficult, and a variety of discordant interpretations have been given of it.—The original may literally be rendered, "On this account his people shall return thither, and waters of fullness shall be wrung out to them." "His people," seems to mean the people of God, who, witnessing the prosperity of the wicked, and experiencing many sorrows and hardships, were tempted to "return thither," (i. e. to the company of the ungodly,) in order to share their ease and pleasure ; but the consequence in general was, that "waters of a full cup were wrung out to them ;" they brought many chastisements and sorrows on themselves, and were oppressed with sorrow for their guilt and folly. 'Not only the reprobate, but also the people of God, fall back, seeing the prosperous state of the wicked, and are overwhelmed with sorrows ; thinking that God considereth not aright the state of the godly.'—The verse is in the future, and it seems most natural to explain it, as the psalmist's apprehension, that the prosperity of daring sinners would eventually prove an invincible temptation, and a great source of sorrow to believers. The clause "waters of a full cup are wrung out to them," probably

'Let the whole earth be filled with the glory of God and of Christ. Blessed, therefore, be thou, O Lord Jesu, for thou art the Lord God, even the God of Israel, who hast wrought such miracles of mercy for the salvation of thy church : and blessed by the tongues of men and angels be thy holy and glorious name : and let the whole earth be filled with thy most excellent glory. So be it, so be it.' (Horne.)—Perhaps the eighteenth verse may be considered as addressed to the God and Father of our Lord Jesus, and the beginning of the nineteenth to the divine Saviour.

V. 20. The dying psalmist, having thus prayed for, and foreseen, his son's prosperous reign, and having looked forward to the coming of the Redeemer, and viewed the whole earth filled with his glory, had no more to ask or to do, but to lie down and rest in hope. (Note, 2 Sam. xxiii. 1—5.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

Pious parents will be the more earnest in prayer for their children, in proportion to the importance of those stations, which they are likely to occupy in society, and in the church of God : and they who have faithfully served their generation, and are going to rest, will be equally attentive to the interests of posterity, especially with respect to true religion.—As it is in every way so important to mankind, that rulers should be men of wisdom and righteousness, protectors of the industrious poor, and terrors to evil-doers of every degree ; it becomes the duty of every man, to pray that God would give the king, and his successor, and all legislators and magistrates, his judgments and righteousness, that "they may judge the people with righteousness, and the poor with judgment." And princes should be reminded by such as have access to them, that they are the vicegerents of God, to whom they must give an account of their authority, and that they ought to imitate him in their government. Whilst we therefore meditate on the nature of the Redeemer's kingdom, let it be observed, that in this respect he is especially an example to all rulers, and will be imitated by all such as are wise and righteous. The wisdom and justice, as well as authority, of God are in him. He is "the King of righteousness, and of peace ;" and, having once "made peace by the blood of his cross," he brings all spiritual blessings on sinners, as a harvest springing forth in every part of the earth. The poor in spirit, the broken-hearted, apply for and obtain from him, peace of conscience, and that peace of God which passeth understanding ; but he will crush the obstinate, the proud, and the impenitent. By the warnings and encouragements of his gospel, multitudes, through successive generations, are brought to fear, submit to, and worship God : and this shall be more and more the case, as long as the sun and moon endure. His gracious truths, attended by the influences of his Spirit, distil, like the refreshing and fruitifying rain upon the parched earth ; and holiness, comfort, and usefulness are the never-failing effects. Thus "in his days the righteous flourish ;" and, whilst they enjoy abundance of peace, are multiplied exceedingly. His people are taught to behave with such equity, truth, and love ; and so to bear with and forgive each other, and to follow peace with all men ; that as far as his kingdom is really set up, discords and contentions cease, in families, churches, and nations : and he defends his harmless subjects, against those who would treat them with deceit and violence. He delivers the needy perishing sinner, when he crieth unto him, from the tyranny and oppression of Satan : he spares believers, though they deserve punishment, and saves their souls from destruction ; he redeems them from all their enemies, "and precious shall their blood be in his sight." Thus he becomes precious to their hearts, and love of him constraineth them to live devoted to his service and glory.—The good seed of his gospel being, as it were, but a handful, sown upon the before barren mountains of the gentile world, hath already produced an immense increase of believers, fruitful in good works, to the glory of God, and the benefit of mankind ; and they shall still increase more and more. His dominion hath already extended very wide ; many kings and nations have become his subjects ; and many of his enemies have licked the dust. At length "all kings shall fall down before him, all nations shall do him service : he shall crush the head of the great oppressor, and destroy all who withstand his cause : "his name and glory shall endure as long as the sun ;" and "men shall be blessed in him," and agree to call him blessed for evermore. May we then submit to his authority, and partake of his righteousness and peace : may we daily celebrate his praises, and bless the God of Israel for the wonders of his redeeming love ! may we spend our days, and end our lives, praying and using all proper means in our power, for the success of the gospel, and longing for that time when "the whole earth shall be filled with his glory ! Amen, and amen."

refers to the cups of liquor mingled with poison, which were in those days given to criminals; but whether it refer to the inordinate sorrow of tempted believers under their own sufferings, contrasted with beholding the success and indulgence of the wicked; or to the painful consequences of yielding to the temptation, and imitating those whom they envied, must remain doubtful.

V. 11. This verse is by some interpreted, in connection with the foregoing, as the language of the tempted believer, who is even induced by what he feels and witnesses, to adopt the language of the ungodly, and to question whether God do indeed know, and take cognizance of, human affairs. This interpretation rises naturally from the words: but, as it is by others thought, that pious persons cannot well be supposed to use such infidel language, they conclude that the psalmist here returns to his subject, and that the profligates above described are again introduced. (Notes, 6-9. x. 2-11. xciv. 1-9.)

V. 12-14. *These blasphemous wretches are the men that prosper in the world... What then are we to think of God, of his providence, and his promises?... All my faith, my charity, and devotions, all my watching and fastings... all the labour and pains I have taken... have been altogether vain and fruitless. (Horne.) (Notes, xxxiv. 5-9. xxxv. 1-3. Mal. iii. 13-18.—The clause, “washed my hands in innocence,” seems equivalent to St. Paul’s words, “herein do I exercise myself to have a conscience void of offence towards God and man.” (Note, xxvi. 6-8. Acts xxvi. 10-21.)

V. 15-17. The psalmist, having related the progress of his temptation, till it came to the crisis, next shews how by faith and grace he prevailed against it. In his greatest dependency, he could not but respect and wish well to “the generation of God’s children;” and he considered, that if he gave utterance to such sentiments, as had arisen within him, they would grieve, condemn, or deceive them, and so cause them to offend. He, therefore, purposed to acquire a full understanding of the mystery in providence; and in the mean while to keep silence: but the more he reflected and reasoned on the subject, the deeper was his conviction, that it was too difficult for him, and the greater perplexity he experienced; until he went at length into the sanctuary of God, to consult the priests, the Lord’s ministers, and examine his word, and spread the case before him in prayer; and then he was enabled to understand the end and final doom of prosperous sinners, so that he could no longer envy them, or complain of his own condition. (Notes, xxxvii. 35-38. xcii. 6, 7. Luke xvi. 19-23.)

V. 18-22. By the light of truth, and the eye of faith, the psalmist clearly saw, that prosperous ungodly men stand on the slippery summit of a tremendous precipice; whence in the appointed time God casts them down by death, with a fall equal to the height to which they were elevated. In a moment they are desolated and ruined, and overwhelmed with terrors. (Notes, lviii. 6-9. Job xx. 4-9. Luke xii. 19-25.) The dread of death and judgment mars their enjoyment; and the death of any one of them terrified the survivors. So that their happiness was but a transient disturbed dream of pleasure: and God poured contempt upon this lifeless image of felicity. (Notes, xxxix. 6. Zech. i. 15-17.) when, arising to take vengeance, he by death awaked them to see substantial good for ever lost, and real misery unavoidable and eternal.—These considerations made him sensible of his sin and folly, in envying such wretched men. He was deeply ashamed, on recollecting the ferment of his heart, and the effect produced even upon his animal frame, without any sufficient cause. And he appeared to himself, and knew that he must appear in the sight of God, to be ignorant and stupid as a beast, which has no conception of any other good than present sensual enjoyment. (Notes, Prov. xxx. 2, 3.)

V. 23-28. Emerging from his temptation, the psalmist found his heart humbled, and his valuation of spiritual blessings greatly enhanced. He reflected, with pleasure and gratitude, on his privileges as a believer. He was persuaded that he was under the immediate care of an ever-present, wise, and faithful friend, who had hitherto upheld him, especially under his urgent temptation, as a tender parent holds his child by the hand, lest he should fall, and hurt himself. He was assured that the Lord would guide him in wisdom through life, and at death “receive him to glory:” nor could any thing, in heaven or on earth, be worthy of being put in competition with his favour, or necessary to his happiness in accession to it. He relied on none of the real or supposed inhabitants of heaven; he expected not his future happiness from the society of the most exalted or excellent creatures; he did not delight even in his earthly friends and comforts, when compared with the fountain of felicity, who was in every respect his all in all. He was aware that his body would speedily decay, his natural spirits fail, and his heart no longer beat; but God would strengthen and support his soul in that last conflict, which would terminate all his sorrows, and then he would be his eternal portion: (Notes, lxxxiv. 11, 12. John xv. 2, 3. xvii. 24. Rom. ii. 7-11. v. 1, 2. 2 Cor. iii. 17, 18. iv. 13-18. 1 Pet. i. 8, 9. v. 1-4:.) whilst the most prosperous of those, who were alienated from God, and under his wrath, must perish; and Israelites especially, who brake their national covenant, by apostasy, idolatry, and rebellion against God, would be more severely punished than others.—But, for his part, he was satisfied that it was “good” (advantageous, pleasant and honourable,) for him to wait upon God, and walk with him, confiding in his mercy, and celebrating his praises, whatever should be his outward circumstances and situation. Thus the psalm concludes with the language of assured hope, and joyful anticipation of future and eternal glory in heaven: and as the sinners, above described, are supposed to prosper even to the end of life; the firm belief of a future state of punishment and perdition to ungodly men, is likewise as explicitly avowed, as almost in any part of the New Testament. (Marg. Ref.) *He who, a little while ago, seemed to question the providence of God over the affairs of men, now exults in happy confidence of the Divine mercy; nothing doubting, but that he would ever continue to guide him on earth, till glory should crown him in heaven. Such are the blessed effects of “going into the sanctuary,” and consulting “the lively oracles,” in all our doubts, difficulties, and temptations. (Horne.)—The doctrine established in this psalm is highly useful, in understanding the arguments contained in the book of Job. (Notes, Job vii. 20-22. ix. 22-24. xlii. 7-9.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1-14. The distinction has been obvious in every age, betwixt mere professors of religion, and those who are inwardly sanctified by the Holy Spirit: and it has always been an undisputed maxim in the church, that the Lord is kind to his true people, whose hearts are upright with him. Yet appearances have often been against this truth; and Satan hath had his advantage in exciting the impatience and unbelief even of pious persons, and causing them to disquiet themselves, and dishonour God, by their surmises; so that many of them have had cause to say, “My feet were almost gone, my steps had well nigh slipped; for I was envious at the foolish, when I saw the prosperity of the wicked.” It is indeed, at first sight, a mystery in providence, that the wicked so often prosper, and the righteous are so much afflicted. Health, long life, affluence, and an easy death, are often granted to the basest of men. Thus their pride, ambition, covetousness, and sensuality, are increased; they grow more daring in impiety and iniquity; and, by their example and discourse, widely diffuse contagion and misery around them; while their impunity emboldens them to infidelity, and they say, “How doth God know, and is there knowledge in the Most High?” The mischief which these prosperous infidels and scornful Christians in the world is indeed very great: many professed Christians are by them drawn into apostasy; and even believers are often greatly discouraged; so that sometimes they are ready to think that their repentance, faith, love, zeal, watchfulness, and conscientiousness, have been in vain. For being chastened from time to time, they are apt to call this being “plagued all the day long.”—But though temptations may thus darken and perplex a true Christian, and very rebellious thoughts may be stirred up: yet there is a holy engrafted principle within, which will counteract them, prevent their effects, and at length gain the ascendancy; and when he has escaped the snare, he will be the better able to counsel and comfort his brethren. (Note, Luke xxii. 31-34.)

V. 15-28. Sometimes, when "the fire burns within," an unwillingness to grieve or stumble his fellow Christians, or to gratify the malice of the wicked, imposes silence on the tempted believer: for he must perceive, on reflection, that if outward prosperity were of great importance, "the generation of God's children," in every age, have acted most imprudently, or been greatly deluded, in enduring so many afflictions for the Lord's sake. We shall, however, never get ground against temptations of this kind, by merely speculating; and shall rather find our minds perplexed with new difficulties and objections, till we bring the whole matter, and weigh it in the balance of the sanctuary. But attention to the sacred Scriptures, and fervent prayer, will soon extricate us from these labyrinths: we shall then be led to look off from things seen and temporal, to things unseen and eternal: and when we consider the end of wicked men, we shall be convinced of their folly and misery; and clearly perceive that they are no more to be envied, than a state-criminal, who is bound in chains of gold till he be put to some tormenting death. We shall then see that their wealth and prosperity were given them in anger, as a punishment of their impiety and enmity against God; and that they were "treasuring up wrath," until the time, when they were to be cast down headlong from their slippery pre-eminence into eternal destruction; of which, in the mean while, they are often tortured with the apprehension. (Notes, Prov. x. 22. xxviii. 1.) Thus their happiness is only a dream; speedily they will awake, and the enchantment will be dissolved, and they will too late perceive their own misery. If we have ever envied such ruinous prosperity, or complained of the salutary corrections of our heavenly Father; if our hearts have rebelled against his appointment: surely on reflection we must be ashamed of our folly and brutish stupidity, as well as of our perverseness and ingratitude! And, indeed, we do not gain a complete victory over the enemy, unless his buffetings prove the occasion of our deeper humiliation before God. (Note, 2 Cor. xii. 7-10.) Surely, that man hath no right or reason to complain, or to envy, who hath God for his friend and father, to provide for, comfort, and uphold him, to guide him here with his counsel, and then to receive him to eternal glory! Indeed, heaven itself could not render us happy without his presence and love: much less could earth and all its possessions satisfy the desires of an immortal soul. And if the Lord is our portion, we need desire no more besides him; for he is all-sufficient and everlasting. The world and all its glory vanisheth; our "flesh and hearts will soon fail;" but God will be the strength of our hearts, and our happiness for ever. By sin we are all indeed far off from God, in the temper of our minds and the state of our souls; and at this distance, misery is inevitable: but by the gospel we are invited to draw nigh to him; and as nothing but preferring other portions and confidences to him and his salvation, can prevent our happiness; so the ruin of such as refuse this gracious offer is most certain; and a profession of Christianity, if men go on in sin, or return back to it, will increase their condemnation. May we then "choose that good part, which can never be taken from us." May we prefer those enduring riches, those holy pleasures, and that genuine honour, which God bestows on his people. May we draw near, and keep near, to him by faith and prayer, and find it good to do so; that, putting our trust in the Lord, and declaring our experience of his love, patiently bearing our cross, and despising worldly objects, we may encourage our brethren to resist, and teach them by our counsel and example to overcome these dangerous temptations of the enemy of our souls.

NOTES.

PSALM LXXIV. Asaph. This psalm seems so adapted to the case of the Jews, during the Babylonish captivity, that if Asaph, who lived in the time of David, were the writer of it, he must have composed it by the spirit of prophecy. But it is far more probable, that it was written by some other Asaph, who lived at the time of the captivity; or, as some think, by one of Asaph's descendants.

V. 1, 2. Israel, as a nation, was typically, (what true Christians are really,) the sheep of God's pasture, his purchased congregation, and ransomed inheritance; whom he redeemed by desolating Egypt, and among whom he dwelt, by the ark, the symbol of his presence, which, from the days of David to the captivity, was stationed on mount Zion, and then was finally lost, or destroyed. (Notes, xcv. 7. Ex. xv. 14-16. Is. xliii. 3, 4. Acts xx. 28.) Both the ten tribes and the kingdom of Judah had given abundant cause for the hot displeasure of God, and even deserved to be "cast off for ever;" yet the pious remnant of the nation, remembering what the Lord had formerly done for their ancestors, and how he had repeatedly pardoned their rebellions, especially when they humbled themselves before him; knowing, also, that the promises and prophecies of the Messiah were not yet accomplished, and witnessing the insults of idolaters over the worshippers of the true God, were emboldened thus to plead, and, as it were, expostulate, with him, for seeming finally to cast off his people, and to retain his anger for ever. (Notes, lxxix. 8-13. Is. lxiii. 7-19. lxxiv. 5-12. Jer. xxxiii. 24.) The church, and every true member of it, under persecution or oppression, though deserving worse than all that is inflicted, may, on similar grounds, plead for deliverance.

V. 3. The idolatrous Chaldeans had wickedly burnt the temple, and left it to perpetual desolations; and God himself seemed to stand at a distance, and pay no regard to it; but the psalmist called on him to come speedily, that he might survey and restore his ruined sanctuary. (Note, xlv. 23-26.)—Some render it, "Lift up thy feet, that thou mayest destroy every enemy, which hath done evil in thy sanctuary." (Notes, Is. xxv. 10-12. lxxiii. 1-6. Rev. xiv. 14-20.)

V. 4. The Chaldeans, rushing into the temple, shouting for victory amidst the affrighted worshippers, and setting up their standards, or erecting trophies of their success, seem to be here described. (Notes, Lam. i. 8-11. ii. 6, 7.) Antiochus Epiphanes afterwards profaned the temple, and dispersed the worshippers, but he did not burn it.—The prevalence of infidelity, and the triumphs of heathens, infidels, and antichristian persecutors and corrupters of Christianity, are events equally lamentable; and the proper directory for prayer on such occasions is here given.

V. 5, 6. 'It was heretofore thought an employment of much honour and merit in those men who did cut down and square the timber-trees for the building of the holy sanctuary. But now every man thinks himself to deserve most thanks, that can do most havoc to thy holy place.' (Bp. Hall.)—'As a skilful person lifeth up the axe in the thick wood, so now men set themselves to work, to demolish the ornaments and timbers of the sanctuary.' (Horne.) 'He that lifeth up the axes upon the thick trees, was crowned as one that brought a thing to perfection; but now they break down,' &c. (Old version.)—The word rendered thick, not denoting the largeness of the trees, but the intricate density of the forest, may be supposed to be a figurative description of the complicated workmanship of the temple, and then the following will be the meaning: 'Each of them is accounted famous, or skilful, according as he hath lifted up the axes on the curious workmanship,' (of the temple.) 'Even now do they beat down the carved work with axes and hammers.' The eagerness of the destroyers, and the honour which they acquired by the work of destruction, are evidently intended. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 7, 8. (Notes, 2 Kings xxv. 8-10. Is. lxiv. 9-12. Zech. xi. 1-3. Matt. xxiii. 27-29.) The word rendered synagogues, is in the fourth verse translated congregations. It means, according to the context, either the stated seasons of assembling, the places in which the people met stately, or the congregations collected together at the solemn feasts, or the solemn feasts themselves. As it is doubtful whether synagogues, in the common sense of the word, had become general before the captivity, it is probable that the courts of the temple in which the people assembled were intended, and that the passage might be rendered, "They have burned God's places of assembling even to the ground." The Septuagint translate the clause, 'They have caused the feasts of the Lord to cease through the land.' (Notes, 2 Kings iv. 23. 2 Chr. xvii. 7-9.)

V. 9. The constant sacrifices on the altar, and the observance of the solemn feasts, were signs of the Lord's presence with his people, which ceased during the captivity; neither had they any miraculous interpositions in their favour. They had little encouragement from prophets, were destitute of prudent counsellors, and could not well determine when these calamities would cease.—Jeremiah, indeed, prophesied in Jerusalem before, and in Egypt after, the destruction of the temple, and Ezekiel and Daniel in Babylon, yet they were often silent for a long while together, and the case of the pious Jews was very discouraging, and their prospect gloomy. all these prophets, after the destruction of Jerusalem, related primarily to other nations, and to distant periods. (Jer. xli. -li. Ez. xxiv. -xxxii.) And though Daniel, and doubtless many others, understood, from Jeremiah's predictions, when to expect some favourable crisis, yet it is evident that even these eminent persons had considerable difficulty in knowing what that crisis would be, and when the nation would be restored to prosperity. (Notes, Dan. ix.) Consequently, the pious remnant, dispersed in distant places, must, in general, have been greatly at a loss on these subjects; and have deeply regretted the want of prophets, bringing them explicit and encouraging messages from God suited to their distressed condition.—The passage, however, is still more aptly descriptive of the state of the Jews in their present long-continued dispersion; and we may well suppose, that when numbers of that nation shall be led to inquire, on what account they have been left in captivity and oppression, for a term of years so vastly exceeding the duration of the Babylonish captivity, without priest, prophet, or token for good, or indication how long it will be before they are restored; this psalm will direct, or even express, their complaints and devotions. (Notes, Gen. xlix. 10. Deut. iv. 26-28. Hos. iii. 4, 5.)—It may also suit the state of the Christian church, under the tyranny of antichrist, the entire termination of which cannot yet be precisely ascertained.

V. 10, 11. The reproaches and blasphemies which insulting idolaters incessantly poured out against God and his worshippers, seem to have more grieved these supplicants than their own distresses; and this was their principal plea in prayer. (Notes, xlv. 23-26. lxxxix. 8-13. lxxxix. 38-45. 51. Is. li. 9-11.)—The last clause is literally, "From the midst of thy bosom; and consume." A highly figurative expression.

V. 12. "Why should we despair of it, since the great God whom they deride has, many ages ago, undertaken the government and protection of us," (the nation of Israel,) "working for us such deliverances in this land, which now lies waste, as astonished all the world." (Bp. Patrick. Marg. Ref. 1 Kings xix. 2 Chr. xix. 9-15. xx. 1-30.)

V. 13-17. Pharaoh, as the great leviathan, (Notes, Job xli;) and his captains and soldiers as sea-monsters of inferior size, were ready to devour Israel in the Red Sea, but were themselves entirely destroyed; and the people were enriched and armed by the spoils of their enemies, as well as encouraged for their march through the wilderness. (Notes, Ex. xiv. xv.) There the rock was cleft to give them water, and then Jordan's flood was dried up to open their passage into Canaan. (Notes, Ex. xvii. 1-7. Josh. iii. iv.) These had been the tokens of JEHOVAH's care of them, and his power displayed in their behalf; and the appointment of the succession of night and day, and of summer and winter, through all the borders of the earth, by Israel's God, was a most encouraging demonstration of his omnipotence; and an emblem of the favourable change which the afflicted Jews hoped he would effect in their circumstances. (Notes, Gen. i. 3-5. 14-19. viii. 15-20. Is. liv. 6-10.)—The word rendered, "the people inhabiting the wilderness," may signify the wild beasts which live in deserts; and the clause may mean, that the bodies of Pharaoh, and his captains, being thrown on shore, were devoured by beasts of prey.

V. 18. (Notes, 21, 22. xiv. 1. lxxxix. 50, 51. Deut. xxxii. 26, 27.)

V. 19. The word rendered, first "multitude," and then "congregation," signifies living, or a living creature. It is often translated "beast," or collectively, "beasts;" but, in many places, it evidently means a living multitude. Some read this verse in connection with the foregoing, "O deliver not the life of thy turtle into the hand of that multitude of the foolish people who blasphemed God.—The church, as faithful and loving, pure and harmless, destitute and defenceless, and silently mourning under the displeasure and at the absence of her Beloved, is described under this beautiful image. Surely the Lord valued his turtle-dove too much to leave her to be devoured by the hawks and eagles which surrounded her. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 20. Though Israel was unworthy of God's regard, and had broken their national covenant, yet even that covenant gave intimation of returning favour to the nation, when brought to confess their sins, and seek humbly to God, even from the ends of the earth, and of a reinstatement in Canaan, after their dispersions. (Notes, Lev. xxvi. 40-42. Deut. iv. 29-31. xxx. 1-10. 1 Kings viii. 46-53.) And the covenant with Abraham and his seed, and that with David and his seed, were in full force. (Marg. Ref.)—The coming of the promised Messiah from that race was thus unalterably secured; and how should the dark places of the earth, which were filled with the habitations of cruelty, be enlightened and converted, or the worship of God be at all maintained; if Israel were destroyed before the coming of that Redeemer, who was to be a "Light to the Gentiles, and the glory of his people Israel?"—All places where thy word shineth not, there reigneth tyranny and ambition.' What a different view does this verse give us of those countries where the oracles of God are not known, from that which some travellers and speculators draw of them! But the view here given is found, on examination, to accord with the real state of things all over the earth; and should stimulate Christians to exert themselves in endeavouring to send the light of truth to the regions of darkness, and the habitations of cruelty.

V. 21, 22. "The oppressed shall not return ashamed; the poor and needy shall praise thy name: Arise, O LORD," &c. "It is thy own cause, as well as ours: therefore, though thou waitest to be called on by us; yet thou wilt certainly and effectually plead it in due time." (Notes, ix. 19, 20. xxi. 13. lxxxix. 8-13. cxv. 1, 2. Matt. vi. 13.)

V. 23. "While speaking, she seems to hear the tumultuous clamours of the approaching enemy growing every minute louder; and we leave the turtle-dove, without the Divine assistance, ready to sink into the talons of the rapacious eagle." (Horne.) (Notes, 1-4.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

Churches and nations, professing true religion, have often provoked God finally to cast them off; so that he would no longer acknowledge them as his flock, or inheritance. But "the sheep" whom he hath purchased, and brought into his pasture, and made to answer in character to this instructive emblem, and in whom he dwelleth by his Spirit, shall never be thus cast off. Yet the rod of his fatherly correction may sometimes be mistaken for the sword of his vengeance; the purification of his church, by the destruction or dispersion of degenerate professors, may make his people think that he intends to "make a full end" with them; and the methods, used for the mortification of the evil propensities of believers, sometimes seem to threaten the destruction of their souls. (Notes, Rom. viii. 22-25.) But God will never utterly forsake any individual, who turneth to him when he smiteth, by penitent faith; or any church, whilst there is a considerable remnant of such, as wrestle with him in fervent prayer to spare and deliver them: nor can the gates of hell prevail against his cause—Infidels, persecutors, and heretics, who do wickedly in God's sanctuary, may make grievous desolations; they may erect their trophies, and glory in the mischief which they have devised; they may run down the truth, silence faithful ministers, shut up places of worship, and persecute Christians; and they may say in their hearts, "Let us destroy them and their religion together." In the mystery of providence they may for a time prosper: and the oppressed servants of God may complain, that they see no tokens of deliverance, have none to encourage or counsel them, and cannot tell how long these calamities will last. But this remnant is the seed of a future harvest: they pray with fervent zeal for the glory of God, that he would not withdraw his hand, or delay his powerful interposition; but that he would "pluck his right hand out of his bosom," to defend the cause of his people, and to vindicate his own insulted honour. Such prayers have hitherto prevailed, and the despised church has survived vast numbers of those assailants, who once triumphed over her, but are now perished as the dung of the earth. Indeed we cannot be too confident that the cause of God will prevail: we are allowed to expostulate with him freely, according to our feelings, when we are grieved to hear his name blasphemed, and his truth reviled; and every former mercy to his church constitutes a cogent argument, why he should again interpose to perfect what he hath so gloriously begun.—The triumph of Christ over Satan, by his crucifixion and resurrection, and the consequent success of his gospel among the Gentiles, may be urged, as a far greater display of his power and mercy, than any of the miracles wrought for the deliverance of Israel. If this God, who thus wrought salvation in the midst of the earth, be our King whom we willingly obey; he will make every assault of Satan, that great leviathan, and of all his progeny, to be profitable to our souls. If we drink of those waters, which flow from our smitten rock, even the sanctifying influences of the Spirit of Christ, (Note, Ex. xvii. 1-6;) he will also divide Jordan's flood before us, that we may pass comfortably from this wilderness to the inheritance prepared for us.—The vicissitudes of day and night, summer and winter, (through the changing of our situation in respect of the sun, the fountain of light which God hath prepared,) are emblematic of those changes in our circumstances and experiences, which must take place on earth; and should remind us neither to be secure, nor to despond. (Note, Jam. i. 16-18.) But in the world above, we shall have no more changes: "our sun shall no more go down, and the days of our mourning will be ended." Whilst, in faith, and hope, and patience, we wait for this completion of our personal felicity; we may also confidently expect a glorious event of all the oppressions, persecutions, and corruptions, which have hitherto harassed the Christian church. We may indeed well enquire of the Lord, with astonishment, how long he will permit his adversaries to blaspheme his name. But it shall not be for ever: and the folly of such as reproach him and his servants, will at length be as visible to all men, as it now is to the remnant of despised believers. (Note, 2 Tim. iii. 6-9.)—The true church is as amiable and pleasant to the Lord, as a turtle-dove; though poor and despicable in the world's estimation. His covenant with the Redeemer engages for more extensive blessings than have yet been vouchsafed. Ere long the Jews shall be converted, the visible church purified, antichrist destroyed, and the fulness of the Gentiles called. This time approaches: let us then call upon our God to "have respect unto his covenant;" to enlighten all the dark nations of the earth, which are filled with cruelty and wickedness: and to rescue his people from shame and dishonour, that the poor and needy may praise his name. Let us call upon him to arise and "plead his own cause," and to silence, effectually and finally, the boastings and clamours of his enemies, which increase continually. This is our duty and privilege; and all the prayers, offered in this behalf, will at length terminate in loud acclamations of praise and thanksgiving.

NOTES.

PSALM LXXV. Title. (Marg. Ref.) If Asaph wrote this psalm, it is probable that he did it, by the desire of David, upon his accession to the throne over all Israel: and the psalm seems well suited to that occasion.—Some, however, think that another Asaph wrote it, in the days of Hezekiah.

V. 1. Thy name, &c. JEHOVAH, exercising all the perfections of his glorious name, or character, was evidently nigh unto his people; as it appeared by his wondrous works for them, which excited their fervent gratitude. (Notes, lxxv. 1. cxxxviii. 2. Ex. xxxiii. 20-23. xxxiv. 5-7. Jer. x. 6-8. Matt. xxviii. 19, 20.)

V. 2. The foregoing verse is the language of the congregation; and this, and those which follow, of a single person, even of a ruler. Some suppose, that the Lord himself is the speaker; who declares, that when his appointed time came, he would execute judgment in righteousness. (Marg. reading and Ref.) (Note, lxxv. 7, 8.) But others think that David, as the type of Christ, engages to rule in equity when placed over the congregation of the Lord. (Notes, ci. 1-8.)

V. 3. The land of Israel was reduced to great distraction, towards the close of Saul's reign; every thing in church and state was unhinged; and the defeat at Gilboa, with the intestine divisions which followed, increased the confusion: but David had been anointed, by God's command, to uphold and establish the estate of Israel. Even before his accession, he had been the chief stay of his country: and when the whole nation willingly submitted to his government, he soon brought their affairs to a happy settlement. (Notes, lx. 1-4. 1 Sam. ii. 4-8. Is. xxiv. 1-12. xlix. 7, 8.)

V. 4. The words rendered "fools," and "deal not foolishly," seem properly to denote mad persons and acting in an infatuated manner.—Saul of Tarsus was exceedingly mad against the church of Christ; but when he came to himself, and was endued abundantly with heavenly wisdom, men began to think him mad. (Notes, Acts xxvi. 9-11. 24-29.)—Lift not up, &c. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 5. The last clause may be rendered, "Ye will speak with a stiff neck," or, "Will ye," &c? (Marg. Ref.)

V. 6, 7. God, the supreme Judge, had put down Saul's family, and appointed David to the throne: and his promotion had come from no other quarter, or cause. It would be madness therefore to oppose any longer the sovereign appointment of JEHOVAH. (Notes, Ps. ii.—(Marg. Ref.)

V. 8. Heavenly blessings are, in Scripture, represented by a cup full of wholesome exhilarating wine: (Notes, cxvi. 13. Matt. xxvi. 26-29:) but the wrath of God is represented by a cup of wine, mingled with ingredients of that kind, which tend to produce fear, distress, and despondency; and, if drunk to excess, horror, infatuation, anguish, and despair. From this cup the Lord dispenseth as he pleaseth to sinners in this world: and even his people drink some of the wine contained in it, when chastened in his fatherly displeasure: but the dregs of it will be the portion of all the impenitent hereafter; who will wring them out, and drink them, to all eternity. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 9, 10. Before David came to the throne, he warned the wicked not to proceed in their evil courses: but he purposed, now that he had acquired authority, effectually to break the power of triumphant wickedness, and to encourage and prefer the righteous; as an apt representative of that righteous King, whom he typified. (Notes, 2. Marg. Ref.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The whole church, militant and triumphant, unites in thanksgivings to God for exalting the Redeemer to his mediatorial throne; and this wonderful dispensation especially declareth his presence with his people. Without him, the earth and all its inhabitants would rush impetuously into universal confusion, impiety, iniquity, and ruin: he alone "bears up the pillars of it;" and all the present hopes, and future happiness, of any of the human race, spring from the righteousness, atonement, intercession, and authority of the incarnate Son of God. Having received his congregation of redeemed sinners, and the kingdom over all for their sake, he judges uprightly; and by his ministers he warns such as proudly rebel, and exalt themselves against him, not to deal foolishly, or to harden their hearts to their own destruction.—That God, who exalted the Redeemer to his throne, is the fountain of honour, as well as the Judge of all: none can prosper who do not submit to him. He will account all to be his enemies, who will not have his beloved Son to be their Lord and Saviour; and such must for ever drink of the cup of his dreadful vengeance. But whilst all the horns of the wicked shall be cut off, and their ruin completed, his church shall inherit the throne of glory. Let sinners then submit to him: let believers rejoice in and obey him: and let Christian magistrates remember their obligations to imitate him, from whom they have their authority; that they may judge righteously, maintain the cause of piety, crush the haughty oppressor, and protect, advance, and exalt the righteous. And let the people recollect, from whom their rulers have their authority; that they "may be subject, not only for wrath, but also for conscience' sake."

NOTES.

PSALM LXXVI. Title. The Septuagint add to this title, "against the Assyrian." The deliverance from Sennacherib indeed seems to have been celebrated in this psalm.

V. 1. In Judah and Israel God was known and worshipped, and his name was honoured; but in no other part of the world, except as Jews or Israelites were dispersed through other nations. (Marg. Ref. Notes, cxlviii. 2, 3. cxlvii. 19, 20. Acts xvii. 22-31. 1 Cor. i. 20-24.)—Indeed, to this day, all the genuine knowledge of the one living and true God, which is found on earth, may be traced back to writers and teachers of this despised nation. Where neither they nor their writings have come, God is still unknown; and if there be any religion, it is idolatry. This assertion admits of no exception or qualification. (Note, Zech. viii. 20-23. Rom. iii. 1, 2.)

V. 2. "Salem" here evidently means Jerusalem. (Note, Gen. xiv. 18-20.)

V. 3. The enemies of Judah had often marched to besiege Jerusalem, with every kind of warlike preparation: but, by the power of God, these formidable preparations became entirely useless, and they were unable to join battle with them. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 4. Zion, the chosen residence of JEHOVAH, was immensely more glorious and excellent than Babylon, or Nineveh; and the kingdom of Judah, than those successively renowned monarchies, which contended with each other, to the destruction of the human species, as the beasts of prey on the mountains devour the feeble animals. (Notes, Dan. vii. 2, 3.) The success of the ambitious warriors, in these destructive contests for power, were deemed their glory and excellency: but the church, beloved and protected by the Lord, and devoted to his service, had a glory and excellency of a nobler kind. (Notes, lxxvii. 3-6. P. O. Ez. xv. 1-6. P. O.)

V. 5, 6. These verses fix the date of this psalm, to the time of the destruction of Sennacherib's army before Jerusalem. Then his stout-hearted captains and soldiers were suddenly deprived of life; and so far from being able to

PSALM LXXVII.

The psalmist relates, what a sharp conflict he had sustained, under his affliction, against despondency, 1-9; and how he baffled the temptation, by meditating on the wondrous works of God for Israel, 10-20.

destroy Jerusalem, as they had boasted they would, they could make no more resistance to the power of the destroying angel, than if their hands had been cut off: for, at the rebuke of that God whom they had blasphemed, they who rode in chariots and on horses, as well as the common soldiers, were cast into a dead sleep. They went to sleep in the evening as in security, but they awoke no more in this world: and thus they were left to be plundered by those whom they came to plunder. (Notes, 2 Kings ix. 35-37. Marg. Ref.)

V. 7. (Notes, 10-12. Jer. x. 6-10. Matt. x. 27, 28. Rev. xv. 1-4.)

V. 8, 9. Hezekiah referred his cause to God by fervent prayer; who by the prophet Isaiah gave judgment from heaven against the blasphemous invaders: and then the angel carried the sentence into execution. (Notes, 2 Kings xix. 14-36. Is. x. 7-19. 24-34. xxix. 5, 6. xxx. 29-33. xxxiii. 1-24.) Thus the Lord saved his humble and afflicted people throughout the land; the nations of the earth, being intimidated, silently desisted from their designs of destroying or enslaving them; and the land of Israel enjoyed profound peace.

V. 10. The rage and malice of the most mighty persecutors and tyrants, were always rendered subservient to the display of JEHOVAH's glory, and to the good of his people. And if they designed any thing of contrary tendency, he failed not to restrain or destroy them. This he had exemplified in the case of Sennacherib, who, being "ordained for correction," (Note, Hab. i. 12-17.) and sent "against a hypocritical nation," was successful in his undertakings, till he had fulfilled the part of the Divine counsel which had been allotted him; but when he attempted to exceed his commission, he was suddenly and effectually restrained from proceeding any further. And this must be considered as a specimen of the Divine conduct in all similar cases. (Marg. Ref. Notes, xlv. 5-11. Gen. i. 20. Dan. xi. 2-4. Acts ii. 22-24. iv. 23-28.)

V. 11, 12. As the Lord had shown himself terrible to the kings of the earth, by intimidating the most courageous, and crushing the most powerful and haughty; so he ought to be worshipped with reverence and awe by all that approached him: (Notes, 7. lxxvii. 4-7. lxxxix. 7-12. Jer. v. 20-25. Dan. v. 5-9. Heb. xii. 26-29. Rev. vi. 12-17.) and his late interposition, in behalf of his people, should excite them to pay the vows, which they made in the day of their distress, and to accompany their prayers with vows on all similar occasions; being liberal as well as fervent in expressing their gratitude to their gracious benefactor. (Notes, lxxvi. 13-15. cxvi. 13-19. Ec. v. 4-7. Nuh. i. 9-15. Marg. Ref.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

God is more fully known, in the harmony of his attributes, under the Christian dispensation, than he was in Judah: and his glory is greater, as dwelling in human nature and in the hearts of his people, than it was formerly, when he had his tabernacle on mount Zion, and was the protector of Jerusalem. In vain do Satan and his servants wage implacable war, with tremendous preparations, against the church: the Lord hath often confounded their devices, marred their weapons of war, and destroyed their armies. His peaceful, harmless, and holy people have frequently been shown to be more formidable by their prayers, as well as more honourable and excellent, than the most successful scourges of mankind: and happy is that nation which is well fortified with these bulwarks; for what is valour, strength, or numbers, against the Almighty? At his rebuke they tremble, stumble, and are not! He "alone is to be feared; for who may stand in his sight when once he is angry?" Yet puny mortals dare madly, through their whole lives, to defy the vengeance of that God, one of whose innumerable company of angels in one night destroyed a hundred and eighty-five thousand men! But if temporal judgments excite such consternation, what will be the case when the Lord shall arise to judgment at the last day! Happy they, who are now meek and "poor in spirit," who trust in his mercy and submit to his will, who vow allegiance to him, and dedicate their all to his service! Man may despise or be enraged at them, and the powers of darkness may excite storms around them; but all shall turn to

NOTES.

PSALM LXXVII. Title. "A psalm composed by Asaph, and sent by him to that song-master, who was over the children of Jeduthun." (Bp. Patrick.)—It is, however, uncertain when the psalm was written, and whether it refers to the personal trials of the psalmist, or to public calamities, or to both combined.—Some conjecture that it was composed, as expressive of Hezekiah's feelings, during his sickness; and others, that it was written during his captivity: but, as no reference is made to any of God's dealings with Israel, subsequent to their deliverance out of Egypt, it seems more likely that it was written as early as the time of David, and by that Asaph who was his contemporary. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 1. The abruptness of the original is very expressive of the agitation of mind, which the psalmist had experienced. "My voice unto God, and I cried; my voice unto God, and he gave ear unto me."—Till his prayer received a gracious answer, this agitation of mind continued, and he proceeds to describe it, and to show how he struggled against impatience and unbelief. (Notes, xl. 1-5. cxvi. 1-4.)

V. 2. Sore. According to this translation, the psalmist represents his affliction, whatever it was, as a wound which bled or ran incessantly, wasting his strength during the night, whilst others were recruiting their's by sleep. (Notes, 4. vi. 6, 7. xxxii. 3-5. xxxviii. 1-9. Job vii. 1-6. 13, 14. Is. xxxviii. 9-13.) But the original word is my hand, and it is probable the following is a just paraphrase of the passage; "In the day of my distress," "I have restlessly implored help from the Lord. In the night, when men are wont to bury their troubles in sleep, I have, with unwearied diligence, spread out my hands unto him, resolving to admit of no consolation till I had obtained a gracious answer." (Bp. Patrick.—Marg. Ref.)

V. 3. "I remembered God, and was greatly disturbed in mind: I meditated, and my spirit was overwhelmed."—He sheweth that we must patiently abide, although God deliver us not out of our troubles at the first cry.—The psalmist describes his inward perturbation by a word expressive of the tumult of the waves in a storm, or that of an enraged disorderly multitude. It is probable, that conscious guilt gave Satan the occasion of exciting in him dismay and distress, when he reflected on the Divine perfections; and that impatience and despondency thus combined, in rendering his soul like the troubled sea; inasmuch that the thoughts of the Lord's mercy and truth, his former kindnesses, and the comfort which he had experienced in religion on other occasions, instead of giving him encouragement, served to enhance his disquietude, now that God hid his face from him, and seemed to become his enemy. (Notes, Job vi. 1-4. xix. 5-22. xxiii. 13-17. Jer. xvii. 15-18. Matt. xxvi. 36-39.)

V. 4. Our Lord was kept watching during that dreadful night, in which, being "sore amazed and very heavy," he said, "My soul is exceeding sorrowful even unto death;" just before he stood silent in the presence of Caiaphas, Herod, and Pilate; and the language in this part of the psalm is so emphatical, that the attentive reader can hardly fail to recollect that of Christ, during the depth of his humiliation. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 5-12. In these verses the psalmist describes his inward struggle against unbelief and despair. In the depth of his distress, he applied his mind to meditate on ancient times, when God had wonderfully interposed in behalf of his people, and shewn himself most ready to pardon their sins, compassionate their sorrows, and to hear their prayers. He also determined to recollect his own experience of such mercies and deliverances as had led him to spend a part

He was, however, tempted to think that God had cast him off for ever, and would shew him no more favour. 'But,' says he, 'can this be? Can he who was known to delight in mercy cease to be merciful? Will he break his own promise? Is he so angry, as no more to pardon the penitent, and pity the miserably? This cannot be. I will reject with abhorrence the dishonourable thought. It is the disease and weakness of my soul, that I ever harboured it. Whatever appearances may be, God continues merciful and faithful, ready to forgive, and plenteous in goodness and compassion. "The years of the hand of the Most High;" the time when he lifted up his right hand to deliver his people, prove this; I will therefore fix my attention on those ancient works of JEHOVAH, and thus endeavour to encourage my desponding heart, and to calm my conflicting passions,' (Notes, xlii. 4, 5. lxxviii. 1. 15-22. 1 Sam. xxx. 6.)—Most expositors seem to think that the psalmist's alarm and distress were occasioned by public calamities, in great measure, at least. But there is no intimation of this; and personal trials and temptations might be so great and complicated as to excite the sharp conflict which he so affectingly describes. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 13. The psalmist's faith and grace now obtained the ascendancy over his rebellious will, his unbelief, and his temptations; and he is satisfied that the "way of God," (or the exercise of his sovereign authority over the world, the church, and every individual,) is under the direction of infinite wisdom, and ordered in perfect justice, truth, and goodness. (Note, xxv. 10.) It is "in holiness," and so consists with his testimonies, his promises, and his covenant. It is "in the sanctuary;" and being beyond the reach of man's wisdom, cannot be understood, except by those who enter into the sanctuary, and weigh all things in the balances of the sanctuary. For his unrivalled, his infinite greatness, seems to cloud the glory of his justice and goodness, to the sinful children of Adam. (Notes, 19, 20. xxxvi. 5-9. xcii. 4-7. xxvii. 2. Rom. xi. 33-36.)

V. 14, 15. 'Thou art the mighty God, who canst do miracles as easily as the most ordinary works; having delivered thy people descended from Jacob, and miraculously preserved by Joseph, from Egyptian bondage.' (Bp. Patrick. Marg. Ref.)

V. 16-18. The waters, even to the bottom of the Red Sea, are here most poetically described as affrighted, and as rendered sensible of the presence of God with Israel, and as obedient to his will; nay, all nature is represented as put into consternation and violent commotion before him. (Note, cxiv. 3-6.) It is probable that the destruction of the Egyptians was attended by most tremendous and destructive tempests, thunders, lightnings, and earthquakes. (Marg. Ref. Notes, Ex. xiv. xv. 1-20.)

V. 19, 20. All the dispensations of God towards his people are in mercy; but, like Israel's passage through the Red Sea, they are often attended with circumstances of dismay. His ways of dealing with them can no more be traced, than the path of Israel, when he led them, as a flock, through the Red Sea; (Notes, Is. lxviii. 11-14;) and they are called to trust in him, whilst he conducts them by a way with which they are wholly unacquainted, and which is displeasing and discouraging to the flesh. (Marg. Ref.)—By these meditations the psalmist at length found his heart encouraged, and therefore he left them upon record for the benefit of posterity. (Notes, lxxviii. 18-28.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

In this world, our praises are often interrupted by complaints. Sin, temptation, affliction, the calamities of the church, and the miseries of the world, must cause us to "groan, being burdened." (Note, Rom. viii. 18-23.) When the heart is greatly pained, nature expresses that pain by the voice; but grace will teach us to send our cries to heaven with earnest importunity for relief. Yet, sometimes, even they who are instant in prayer, may be tempted to despond, and to overlook the sources of comfort which are pointed out to them, and a deep sense of their own unworthiness may afford Satan an opportunity of suggesting such gloomy apprehensions, that even thoughts of God may increase their disquietude and horror. Thus the eyes may be holden from

PSALM LXXVIII.

An exhortation to Israel to consider the works and word of God; that what they had learned from their fathers, they might teach their children, for the benefit of even their remote posterity, 1-8. An abstract of the history of Israel's deliverance from Egypt, passage through the wilderness, settlement in Canaan, and the subsequent events; in which the mercies of God to them are contrasted with an account of their unbelief, apostasies, and idolatries, 9-68. God at length chooses Judah, Zion, and David, 67-72.

* Maschil of Asaph.

<sup>a</sup> GIVE ear, O my people, to my law: incline your ears to the words of my mouth.

2 <sup>b</sup>I will open my mouth in a parable: I will utter <sup>c</sup>dark sayings of old;

3 <sup>d</sup>Which we have heard and known, and our fathers have told us.

4 <sup>e</sup>We will not hide them from their children, <sup>f</sup>shewing to the generation to come <sup>g</sup>the praises of the LORD, and his strength, and his wonderful works that he hath done.

5 For <sup>h</sup>he established <sup>i</sup>a testimony in Jacob, and appointed a law in Israel; which he commanded our sleep, and the mouth may be closed, whilst sorrows, too big for utterance, distend and distract the heart. But this will not last very long with the upright believer; the troubled fountain will work itself clear again; and even the recollection of former times of more joyful experience, though it cause his wounds to bleed afresh, will often suggest a hint, or inspire a hope, tending to his relief. It is, however, always good to "commune with our own hearts;" and to make diligent search concerning the cause, the intention, and the remedy of our distresses; especially, that we may ascertain whether, notwithstanding our unworthiness, we be indeed truly humbled believers. And if the enemy would lead us to suspect that the "LORD will cast off his people for ever," and be no more favourable unto them, we should reject the injurious suggestion with horror and indignation. What, will God no more favour those who have walked with him, and are now mourning after him? Hath his everlasting mercy come to an end? Is his faithful promise failed? Hath God forgotten to be gracious, and in anger shut up his tender mercy? And will he dishonour himself, by leaving the humble, penitent, praying soul, to perish? (Note, xlii. 5, 6.) It is our infirmity, for which we should rebuke ourselves, if we have for a moment entertained such thoughts; and we should, without delay, turn our minds to more encouraging meditations. The years of ancient times, and the LORD's wonders for his people of old, form proper subjects for our contemplation and discourse on such occasions, as they are illustrious evidences of his power, mercy, and love, to his church. But the mysteries of redeeming love, and the great events which attended the Saviour's sufferings and exaltation to his glorious throne, should be our favourite theme. There all the Divine perfections are displayed; and the sinner, who understands and believes the testimony of Scripture on this subject, will be encouraged to expect every thing from the power, truth, and love of that God, who "spared not his own Son, but delivered him up for us all, that with him, he might freely give us all things." (Notes, Rom. viii. 28-32.) It is true that the LORD's way is "in the sea," but it is also "in the sanctuary;" he leads his people through deep waters of affliction, or temptation, but he goes with them, and brings them forth, when he hath thus destroyed their enemies. We cannot trace his footsteps, nor understand the reasons of his dispensations; but we are called to believe that he will guide us by his counsel; and that those things which we are tempted to ascribe to his having "forgotten to be gracious," are the result of his unsearchable wisdom choosing for us, in order to our good, what we should never have chosen for ourselves. If he see proper, he can soon raise up such instruments as Moses and Aaron to lead his people like a flock, through intervening seas and deserts, to their inheritance; and if the under-shepherds neglect their charge, he will feed and guide them himself. "Happy then are the people who are in such a case; yea, blessed are the people, who have the LORD for their God."

NOTES.

PSALM LXXVIII. V. 1. The word rendered law, in this connection, evidently means the doctrine, or instruction, which the psalmist was divinely inspired to set before the people. (Marg. Ref.)—It is probable, that Asaph wrote this psalm some years after the death of David.

V. 2. The Evangelist says that this was fulfilled, when Christ spake to the people in parables; (Notes, Ps. xlix. 1-4. Matt. xiii. 34, 35.) Yet the psalm contains nothing but a plain narrative of facts, without any thing of parable or riddle in it; except as the history of Israel, like the parables of Christ, was a picture, or similitude, of heavenly things; and these records would remain, in this respect, dark sayings to those who understood not the typical meaning of them. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 3-8. The Israelites were frequently and earnestly instructed to render their children, by every means, familiarly acquainted with the works and commandments of God; and as the psalmist and his contemporaries had derived the benefit of this most useful information from their ancestors, he was determined, and aimed to induce others also, to deliver down the same to the rising race, and through them to the next generation, and thus successively to the end of time. For this was the proper method of bringing them to trust in God, and obey him; to imitate the faith and holiness of their pious ancestors; and to take warning not to copy the rebellion, unbelief, and ungodliness of such as had brought the judgments of God upon them by their sins. (Marg. Ref.)

7 That they might <sup>3</sup>set their hope in God, and <sup>4</sup>not forget the works of God, but <sup>5</sup>keep his commandments:

8 And might not be <sup>6</sup>as their fathers, a stubborn and rebellious generation; a generation that <sup>7</sup>set not their heart aright, and <sup>8</sup>whose spirit was not stedfast with God.

9 <sup>9</sup>The children of Ephraim, being armed, and <sup>10</sup>carrying bows, <sup>11</sup>turned back in the day of battle.

11 And <sup>13</sup>forgot his works, and his wonders that he had shewed them.

12 <sup>14</sup>Marvellous things did he in the sight of their fathers, in the land of Egypt, in the field of <sup>15</sup>Zaan.

15 He <sup>19</sup>clave the rocks in the wilderness, and gave them drink as out of the great depths.

17 And <sup>21</sup>they sinned yet more against him by provoking the Most High in the wilderness.

18 <sup>22</sup>He <sup>23</sup>tempted them in the wilderness, and said, <sup>24</sup>Will I give them the bread of angels? will I give them flesh, and will I give them bread? will I give them strength, and will I give them power? will I give them gold, and will I give them silver? will I give them horses, and will I give them chariots? will I give them horses, and will I give them chariots? will I give them horses, and will I give them chariots?

19 <sup>25</sup>He <sup>26</sup>tempted them in the wilderness, and said, <sup>27</sup>Will I give them the bread of angels? will I give them flesh, and will I give them bread? will I give them strength, and will I give them power? will I give them gold, and will I give them silver? will I give them horses, and will I give them chariots? will I give them horses, and will I give them chariots? will I give them horses, and will I give them chariots?

Notes, lxxi. 17, 18. cxlv. 4-7. Ex. xii. 26, 27. xiii. 11-16. Deut. vi. 6-9.) The word testimony is used for the ark, and for the law written on tables of stone put within the ark, and covered with the mercy-seat. This testified the Lord's gracious presence with his people, and seemed to point out to them both the way of access and acceptance, and the standard or rule of their duty. (Note, Ex. xxv. 16-21.)

V. 9-11. Nothing is recorded in the history of Israel concerning the cowardice of the Ephraimites, as distinct from that of the other tribes; some therefore think that "the children of Ephraim" are put, by a figure of speech, for the nation in general. Others suppose, that this tribe greatly influenced their brethren, when they refused to go up and possess the land, at the express command of God, who promised to fight for them; and then, after the sentence of exclusion was irrevocably passed, they armed themselves, and presumptuously would go up, contrary to the warning of God by Moses; but when the Amorites came out against them, they fled, and were chased like bees to Hormah. (Notes, Num. xiv.) But the passage may relate to the defeat of Israel by the Philistines, when the ark of God was taken. Shiloh, which was then desolated, was situated in the lot of Ephraim; and perhaps the men of that tribe led on the battle; but, giving way, their misconduct brought on a general defeat. (Note, 1 Sam. iv.) In either case, the cowardice of the people was the effect of their unbelief and disobedience. They answered not the expectations formed of them; "they kept not the covenant of God, and refused to walk in his laws: They forgot," &c.—These verses, however, may be understood of Israel, who, in their general conduct, imitated that of Ephraim, in some notorious instances of cowardice and ill behaviour. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 12. The reader must once for all be referred to the notes, &c.; upon the parts of the preceding history, pointed out in the margin, in which all the events here recapitulated have been fully considered. This poetical abstract would greatly assist the people in becoming acquainted with their most instructive history, and preserving a ready remembrance of it. Zaan was a principal city of Egypt, in which perhaps Pharaoh kept his court. (Marg. Ref. 43-49.)

V. 13-16. These verses are read in some versions in the pluperfect tense. "He had divided," &c. He had wrought these miracles for Israel, before those rebellions which the psalmist was enumerating; and this rendered their unbelief and disobedience the more inexcusable. (Notes, Ex. xiii. 21, 22. xiv. xv.)—Two rocks were smitten in the wilderness. (Notes, Ex. xvii. 1-7. Num. xx. 7-13.)—Let us, saith Bishop Taylor, 'by the aids of memory and fancy, consider the children of Israel in the wilderness, "in a barren and dry land where no water was," marching in dust and fire, not 'wet with the dew of heaven,' but wholly without moisture, save only what dropt from their own brows:—suppose, I say, these thirsty souls hearing Moses promise that he will smite the rock, and that a river should break forth from thence; observe, how presently they run to the foot of the springing stone, thrust forth their heads

20 Behold, <sup>5</sup>he smote the rock, that the waters gushed out, and the streams overflowed; <sup>6</sup>'can he give bread also? can he provide flesh for his people?

21 Therefore <sup>7</sup>the LORD heard this, and was wroth: so <sup>8</sup>a fire was kindled against Jacob, and anger also came up against Israel;

23 Though <sup>10</sup>he had commanded the clouds from above, and <sup>11</sup>opened the doors of heaven, 24 And <sup>12</sup>had rained down manna upon them to eat, and had given them of the corn of heaven.

25 <sup>13</sup>'Man did eat angels' food: <sup>14</sup>'he sent them meat to the full.

28 And he let <sup>19</sup>it fall in the midst of their camp, round about their habitations.

29 So they did eat, and were well filled: <sup>20</sup>'for he gave them their own desire;

30 They were not estranged from their lust: <sup>21</sup>'but while their meat was yet in their mouths, and tongues to meet the water, impatient of delay, crying out that the water did not move, like light, all at once: then suppose the pleasure of their drink, the insatiableness of their desire. They took in as much as they could, and they desired much more. This was their sacrament, and this their manner of receiving it. And if that water was a type of our sacrament, or a sacrament of the same secret blessing, then is their thirst a signification of our duty.

32 For all this <sup>24</sup>they sinned still, and <sup>25</sup>believed not for his wondrous works.

V. 17-31. Some time after the manna and the water from the rock had been vouchsafed, the people began again to murmur and rebel against God; and some of them were consumed by lightning; "and yet for all this his anger was not turned away," because they murmured still more. The table, which they insolently required, was not the manna, for that had been sent, with a multitude of quails also, before the water from the rock. (Notes, Ex. xvi.) But they loathed and despised manna as light bread; and wanted such provisions as the inhabitants of cultivated countries live upon, which they thought God could not provide in the desert. Perhaps they endeavoured to persuade themselves, that the manna, and the water from the rock, were supplied from natural resources; and only directed or regulated in a supernatural manner by JEHOVAH'S power: but they supposed it to be impossible even for Omnipotence to furnish bread and flesh to so vast a multitude. This conclusion, after all the works of God which they had witnessed, and his special favours and express promises to them, was exceedingly provoking: he therefore determined to vindicate the honour of his own name, by showing that he was able to feast, as well as feed them, in the wilderness; and then amidst their excessive indulgence, to punish their unbelief and rebellion, by cutting off the most powerful, healthy, and luxurious amongst them. (Notes, Num. xi. 1-23. 31-35. Marg. Ref.)—Manna, descending from the clouds, is here called "the corn of heaven," and "angels' food," or "the bread of the mighty;" perhaps, because it rendered the people healthy, and vigorous for their marches and wars. But it typified "that bread which came down from heaven, and giveth life to the world;" by which man is brought to feed on angels' food, and to participate their felicity. (Notes, John vi. 27-35. 41-58.)

V. 32, 33. Here, that instance of unbelief and rebellion, which provoked God to exclude the whole generation from the promised land, is peculiarly adverted to: as, for that sin, they were condemned to die in the wilderness, without ever enjoying or witnessing the comforts of a cultivated country, a settled abode, and a competent regular provision.—Their lives, even more than those of other men, were indeed spent in vanity; and as scarcely any of that vast multitude had arrived at the age of sixty, when their wanderings were ended, ("for indeed the hand of the LORD was against them to consume them.") it might well be said, according to the original, "their years were consumed in haste." (Notes, Num. xiv. P. O. Marg. Ref.)—Though they travelled up and down, very long and very much, yet it was to no purpose; for they were never the nearer their journey's end. (Bp. Patrick.)

34 "When he slew them, then they sought him: and they returned and enquired early after God.

35 And "they remembered that "God was their rock, and the high God "their redeemer.

36 Nevertheless "they did flatter him with their mouth, and "they lied unto him with their tongues.

37 For "their heart was not right with him, neither were they "stedfast in his covenant.

38 But "he, being full of compassion, forgave their iniquity, and destroyed them not: yea, "many a time turned he his anger away, and did not stir up all his wrath.

39 For "he remembered that they were but flesh; "a wind that passeth away, and cometh not again.

40 "How oft did they "provoke him in the wilderness, and "grieve him in the desert!

41 Yea "they turned back and tempted God, and "limited the Holy One of Israel.

42 They "remembered not his hand, nor "the day when he delivered them from "the enemy.

43 How "he had "wrought his signs in Egypt, and his "wonders in the field of Zoan; 44 And had "turned their rivers into blood; and their floods, that they could not drink.

45 He "sent divers sorts of flies among them, which devoured them; and "frogs, which destroyed them.

46 He "gave also their increase unto the caterpillar, and their labour unto the locust.

47 He "destroyed their vines "with hail, and their sycamore-trees with "frost.

48 He "gave up their cattle also to the hail, and their flocks to "hot thunderbolts.

49 He "cast upon them the fierceness of his anger, wrath, and indignation, and trouble, "by sending evil angels among them.

50 He "made a way to his anger; "he spared not their soul from death, but gave their "life over to the pestilence;

51 And "smote all the first-born in Egypt; "the chief of their strength in "the tabernacles of Ham;

52 But "made his own people to go forth like sheep, and guided them in the wilderness "like a flock.

53 And he led them on safely, "so that they feared not: "but the sea "overwhelmed their enemies.

54 "And he brought them to the border of his sanctuary, even to this mountain, which "his right hand had purchased.

55 He "cast out the heathen also before them, and "divided them an inheritance by line, "and made the tribes of Israel to dwell in their tents.

56 "Yet they tempted and provoked the most high God, and kept not his testimonies;

57 But "turned back, and dealt unfaithfully like their fathers: "they were turned aside like a deceitful bow.

58 For they provoked him to anger with "their high places, and "moved him to jealousy "with their graven images.

59 When "God heard this, he was wroth, "and greatly abhorred Israel:

60 "So that he forsook the tabernacle of Shiloh, the tent which he placed among men;

62 He "gave his people over also unto the sword: and was "wroth with his inheritance.

V. 34. Who, that hath been conversant in the house of mourning, and about the bed of sickness, but must have seen frequent instances of a temporary and deceitful repentance? (Horne.) (Marg. Ref. Notes, Jer. xxii. 20-23. Hos. v. 15. Luke xvii. 11-17.)

V. 35. Redeemer. That is, from Egyptian bondage; for the bulk of the people did not understand the spiritual redemption, which was typified by that transaction. (Marg. Ref.)—Right, (36.) Or, constant. (Note, li. 10.)

V. 36, 37. "Such was their hypocrisy, that they sought God for fear of punishment, though in their heart they loved him not."—Whatsoever cometh not from the pure fountain of the heart, is hypocrisy. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 38. "Had God stirred up all his wrath, the Israelites must have been exterminated in the wilderness. But then the promises made to Abraham, &c. must have failed. Therefore they were...not destroyed; judgment was executed from time to time upon offenders; but the nation subsisted, till the seed came to whom the promise was made. Nay, the race is yet marvellously preserved, and we trust...in mercy." (Horne.)—(Notes, Num. xiv. 13-19. 27-30.)

V. 39. (Marg. Ref.) The frailty of man, as incapable of enduring the wrath of God, is here emphatically described; as well as the Divine compassion for such feeble worms: but it is not to be supposed, nor can the language be fairly interpreted to mean, that God considers man's sinful nature as a palliation of his actual rebellions; yet the passage is sometimes thus explained. (Notes, Gen. vi. 3. Matt. xxvi. 40, 41.)

V. 41. Limited, &c. The Israelites did not believe, that God could and would destroy the Anakims before them, and give them the land of Canaan: but they set bounds to his power, as if some things were beyond it. (Notes, 17-31. John xi. 20-32.)

V. 42-45. Devoured. (Notes, Ec. vii.—ix.) This word shews, that, besides the loathsomeness of flies, and their maggots; a variety of venomous insects, reptiles, or animals, were sent among the Egyptians, to bite, and sting, and harass them; and that in many instances their bite or sting was mortal. Indeed the word rendered "divers sorts of flies," is so general, that even devouring wild beasts may be meant by it, as well as insects and reptiles. (Notes, Ex. viii. 19-24.)

V. 46-49. (Marg. Ref. Notes, Ex. ix. x.) Perhaps evil angels terrified the Egyptians, during the plague of darkness: they were, however, permitted to deceive and harden them to their destruction. "Being horribly astonished, and troubled with strange apparitions; for neither might the corner that held them keep them from fear: but noises as of waters falling down sounded about them; and sad visions appeared to them with heavy countenances. No power of the fire might give them light; neither could the bright flames of the stars endure to enlighten that horrible night. Though no terrible thing did fear them; yet being scared with beasts that passed by, and hissing of serpents, they died for fear." (Wisdom of Solomon, xvii. 3-10.) Such were the traditions of the Jews on this subject, when this apocryphal book was written.

V. 50. The preceding miracles and judgments, during which the long-suffering of God had given the Egyptians space for repentance, had only proved an occasion to them of filling up the measure of their sins; and this made a way, (or, weighed a path, Marg.) for the execution of his righteous vengeance. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 51-54. (Notes, lxxvii. 19, 20. lxxx. 1. Gen. ix. 24, 25. Ex. xii. 29, 30. xiv. 21-31. Heb. xi. 29.) Purchased, (54.) Or, Claimed, and taken possession of, for the inheritance of his chosen people. The whole land of Canaan seems to have been intended.—Notwithstanding Israel's multiplied rebellions, and the terrible judgments inflicted on them, mercy at last prevailed, and the nation enjoyed the promised inheritance. (Marg. Ref. Note, Ex. xv. 13.)

V. 56-60. The history of Israel, from the death of Moses to that of Eli, as contained in the books of Joshua and Judges, and the first four chapters of the first of Samuel, forms the best comment on these verses. Notes, cvi. 7-46. 2 Kings xvi. 7-23. Neh. ix. 7-35. Jer. vii. 12-15. xxvi. 6-9. Ez. xvi. xx. 10-37. xxvii. 1-23. The continually repeated apostasies of the Israelites to idolatry rendered them like a deceitful bow, that never sends the arrow to the mark, but always disappoints the archer's expectations. (Notes, 8-10. 37.)

V. 61. Strength, &c. That is, The ark, the symbol of JEHOVAH's protecting presence with his people, and which, as typifying the harmonious display of his perfections in the salvation of Christ, is also called his "glory," or his beauty. (Notes, Ex. xxv. 10-21. 2 Chr. vi. 41, 42.)

V. 63. The wrath of God gave up the army of Israel into the hands of the Philistines, to be consumed as by fire. Thus their young men perished, their enemies triumphed, and their virgins were not praised, (according to the custom of commending them in songs, when they were married.) Either they remained single; or in a time of public calamity, amidst the insulting oppressions of their enemies, all the customary tokens of joy were omitted. (Notes, 1 Sam. iv.)

V. 64. The wife of Phinehas, hearing of his death, soon expired, and so did 66 And he smote his enemies in the hinder part: he put them to a perpetual reproach.

67 Moreover he refused the tabernacle of Joseph, and chose not the tribe of Ephraim:

68 But chose the tribe of Judah, the mount Zion, which he loved.

69 And he built his sanctuary like high palaces, like the earth which he hath established for ever.

V. 65, 66. While the Philistines were inflicting deserved punishment on the Israelites, the Lord seemed like one asleep, and as not regarding either his people, or even "the ark of his strength." But when their resentment, or ambition, had accomplished his purposes, he suddenly and effectually interposed, to rebuke the impious triumphs of the idolaters, and to put them and their idol to a perpetual shame: (Note, lxxvi. 10.) even as a mighty man of valour would rest, or refresh himself, notwithstanding the advance of the enemy, till the moment arrived for executing his own plan; and then he would burst forth on them with unexpected and irresistible fury. (Notes, Is. xlii. 13—17. li. 9—11.) By the emeralds, the Lord disgraced as well as discomfited the Philistines; and he constrained them to send back the ark; and by the golden images of the emeralds, and of the mice that marred the land, they were led to publish and perpetuate their own disgrace. V. 67—69. (Notes, cxxxii. 6—17. Gen. xlix. 9, 10. John iv. 19—24. Marg. Ref.) These verses shew that the psalm was written after the building of the temple, and consequently not sooner than eleven or twelve years after the death of David. For the language cannot suit the tabernacle which he placed on mount Zion; as that was soon to be superseded by a magnificent temple, which was at length erected so strong, that it appeared likely to stand as long as the earth endured. It was, however, destroyed by Nebuchadnezzar; and though Zion continued the center of JEHOVAH's worship, till the coming of Christ; yet it has now been trodden under foot of the Gentiles for above seventeen hundred years. (Note, Luke xxi. 20—24.)

What an emphatical attestation to the excellency of David's general conduct, as king of Israel, does this passage contain! (Notes, 2 Sam. xxiii. 3, 4. 1 Chr. xxix. 10—19. 26—28. 2 Chr. xxix. 2, 3. xxxi. 20, 21.) In this especially he was a type of our Saviour, and a pattern both to rulers, and Christian ministers.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—11. The instructions of the sacred word are dark sayings to the inattentive and self-confident: and yet they are very plain to the humble, diligent, and obedient enquirer, who earnestly prays for the teaching of the Holy Spirit, and reduces to practice, and realizes in his experience, what he learns from thence. (Notes, Prov. i. 1—6. ii. 1—6. xiv. 6.) The truths, precepts, and works of God, which have been recorded and transmitted to us by our progenitors, form a sacred deposit, which we must hand down to posterity: "showing to the generation to come the praises of the Lord, and his strength, and his wonderful works that he hath done; and they too should arise, and declare them to their children; that they might set their hope in God, and not forget the works of God, but keep his commandments." (Note, Rom. iii. 1, 2.) To perform this important duty to good purpose, we must enforce our instructions by a consistent example: and it is awful to think how many parents, by their negligence and wickedness, become the murderers of the souls of their children. But should any young persons read these observations, who cannot but know that their parents are stubborn and rebellious; let them remember, that, though they must not expose their faults, or neglect to submit to them in all things lawful; yet they must neither obey their sinful orders, nor copy their examples. On the contrary, they are bound to requite their kindness in things temporal, by earnestly praying for their conversion: and by recommending the profession of the gospel to them, with the most respectful, obliging, and affectionate behaviour; and by such modest hints, as may consist with the honour due to that superior relation.—The lax principles, the disobedience, and the apostasy of many professed Christians, shew, that they never set their hearts aright, and that their spirit was never steadfast with God: they were never duly humbled and set against sin; they never were weaned from the world, or prepared for the cross and the conflict; they never cordially received the Lord for their portion and salvation, counting all but loss in comparison of him. In time of temptation, therefore, like the cowardly Ephraimites, though armed as soldiers, they basely turn their backs on the enemy; "they renounce the covenant of God, and refuse to walk in his law."

V. 12—54. We cannot avoid repeating, that in Israel's history we have a picture of our own hearts and lives, and a compendium of the history of the world, and of the church: (Neh. ix. P. O.) The common benefits afforded by the Creator to the whole human race, when viewed in connection with our conduct towards him, evidently leave us without excuse. His sun rises to give us light, his rain descends to make the earth fruitful, and the seasons in succession pour forth an exuberance for our use and indulgence; yet these blessings are generally received with unthankfulness, and abused in intemperance; few are content with meat for their use, but almost all crave provision for their lusts, and are unwilling, to trust the power and goodness of God for the future. Insensible of the protecting hand of him, "in whom they live, and move, and are," most men spend their lives in rebellion: and when he is provoked to bring them into troubles and dangers, there are but few who seem to return to and inquire after him; and the event proves, that most of these few "only flatter him with their mouth, and lie unto him with their tongues." So that the patience of God, and the warnings and mercies which he sends, "to lead men to repentance," embolden them to harden their hearts, and treasure up wrath, until the measure of their iniquities is full; and then he casts upon them the fierceness of his wrath, and gives them up to be hardened and destroyed.—The history of nations is, in many respects, the same. God hath not, indeed, dealt with any nation, in every respect, as he did with Israel; but increasing affluence and prosperity have almost uniformly produced proportionable pride, luxury, licentiousness, and impiety; and judgments and mercies have generally been neglected, or very superficially attended to, until the measure of national guilt was filled; and then some other people were employed to execute the vengeance of God upon them.—This hath appeared with peculiar evidence in nations favoured with the word of God, and professing his truth. The outward means of grace have been to them like the pillar of cloud and fire, and the bread and water of life; and manifold providential favours have been vouchsafed. But where is that nation professing Christianity, which hath not copied Israel's example? Certainly Britain is no exception to this rule. On us the manna hath been rained all around our habitations; and wells of salvation have been opened, and the waters of life have flowed in almost every corner of our land. We have been equally favoured by an indulgent Providence, and have experienced many former and later extraordinary deliverances; but neither judgments nor mercies have prevented the rapid increase of infidelity, profligacy, impiety, and oppression. And if, under any pressing calamities, we have seemed sensible of our obligations and dependence, and have returned and inquired after God, "our Rock and our Redeemer;" the event hath detected our base hypocrisy. Hitherto, the Lord, being full of compassion, hath spared us; but if we still forget his mercies, and neglect and abuse his gospel, what can we expect, but that he will cast us off, and number us with the hardened Egyptians, and make a way for his anger, and glorify himself by inflicting judgments on us, as singular as our mercies have been?—Even to those collective bodies, which have made a stricter profession of his truth, the case has been similar. Distinguished advantages have not prevented churches, one after another, from degenerating into formality or heresy, from forsaking the covenant, and casting off the commandments of God. The profession and knowledge of the truth have, in many instances, only increased pride and presumption: men have administered the sacred ordinances as mere external forms; and they have rested upon the baptism of water, and the sacramental bread and wine, without the inward and spiritual grace signified by them. (Notes, 1 Cor. x. 1—12.) Many religious societies have split into parties, and turned aside unto vain jangling; many have evidently turned back into the world; and others have declined to superstition and will-worship, and provoked God to jealousy by their high places and graven images; and neither warnings, mercies, nor judgments, have stopped their course, till their candlesticks have been removed, and their privileges given to others. Nor has any collective body yet been found, which hath been durably preserved from such declensions. Let those "which think they stand, take heed lest they fall."—Even true believers are not unconcerned. Many of them can recollect, that, for years, they perverted the kindness of Providence into an occasion of sin. The Lord's patience emboldened them in their evil courses; his bounty increased their self-indulgence; and even the warnings of his word, and their convictions of conscience, served only to discover their obstinacy in rebellion. Perhaps a near prospect of death sometimes frightened them to their devotions, but, upon recovery, they relapsed into ungodliness. They must therefore now admire the Lord's compassion and forbearance, in that he did not stir up all his wrath against them and destroy them. At length, he came with an outstretched arm for their deliverance; and he found them slaves of Satan, and in love with their bondage, nor could they be persuaded to accede to his invitations: nay, they hated and resisted his truths and convictions, until his new creating grace had powerfully made them willing. Then he broke off their chains, and rescued them from their oppressor; he forgave their sins, and supplied their wants, and opened their way to liberty; and their salvation, in its full latitude, far exceeded in love and power that which Israel experienced when brought up out of Egypt. Since that time of mercy, he hath guided and guarded them; they have fed upon the bread of heaven, and drunk water from the wells of salvation. But though many of them have been preserved from scandalous offences, yet how often have they grieved his Holy Spirit, and provoked his chastening rod! Frequently they have been discontented with their temporal provision, and "craved meat for their lusts;" they have secretly murmured at his appointments, and distrusted his power and love; they have limited him to their methods, and doubted whether he could otherwise provide or deliver! Alas! we have all provoked him by our unbelief, forgetfulness, and ingratitude; and have often been chastened, by having our inordinate desires granted in anger. Severe afflictions have been necessary to recover us from our backslidings; and though we were not mere hypocrites in returning to the Lord, yet we have soon forgotten the salutary lesson; if our hearts have, perhaps, been sincere, yet they have not been steadfast with him. So that it is of the Lord's mercies that we are not consumed with our fellow-sinners; and

PSALM LXXIX.

The psalmist complains to God of the desolations of Jerusalem, and the cruel insults of the heathen, 1-5. He prays for deliverance and forgiveness; and that the Lord would glorify himself, by avenging his people on their oppressors, 6-13.

A Psalm *of Asaph.

we have cause to review with shame and gratitude every stage of our journey through the wilderness. And when we shall come to our inheritance, how shall we admire the Lord's patience and mercy, who led us forth like a flock, safely, and without cause of fear; who destroyed our enemies, and brought us through every intervening difficulty, to the purchased possession of his heavenly kingdom! Then, indeed, we shall no more distrust or dishonour our God; we shall no more rebel, or be ungrateful. In the mean time, we should walk humbly and watchfully, trusting only in his mercy; and cheerfully submitting to the discipline and chastisement which our remaining perverseness renders necessary; and praying daily and fervently that we may profit by all our trials, and all our miscarriages and mercies.

V. 55-72. The church at large is also concerned in this review; the power and mercy of God have been as conspicuous, in preserving her from being ruined by intestine corruptions, as in protecting her against external violence. Her history, from the beginning to the coming of the Redeemer, hath appeared to be a constant succession of gracious interpositions of God in her behalf, requited with continual rebellions and apostasies. Often did the Lord pour contempt upon the externals, in which his professing people confided; and even delivered "the ark of his glory and strength" into captivity, and suffered their priests to be massacred by the heathens: yet in due time he arose again for their help, and put their enemies to shame, or cast them down into destruction. This appears very remarkably in the history of Israel till the days of David, whom he took from the sheepfolds, to rule and feed his people, and to promote their prosperity and religious advantage. And their subsequent history, until the coming of the Son of David, is of the same kind. Then Christianity succeeded to the Mosaic dispensation; and Jerusalem being desolated, the Jews were cast out of the church. Under the rule and guidance of the good Shepherd, who feeds his flock with most perfect integrity and skilfulness, one would have expected a better state of affairs: yet the history of the Christian church hitherto hath been of the same cast; and nothing but the patience of God could have borne with the abominations, which have prevailed among men who are called by the name of Christ! Nor are matters yet much mended: and the experimental trial, which God hath made of human nature, under every dispensation, confirms his testimony, "that the heart is deceitful above all things, and desperately wicked;" and that nothing but a new creation by the power of the Holy Spirit, can cure any of the human race of their propensity to ungodliness and iniquity. May the Lord then arise as one awaked out of sleep, and put his enemies to a perpetual reproach! may he purify and unite his church; and raise up kings and pastors like David, and like Christ, under whom his work may prosper, and true religion spread throughout the earth! And let us not limit our God: he can do all things, and can easily form proper instruments, and make them successful, and render true piety as universal as iniquity hath hitherto been. But let every reader fear the doom of his enemies, and read with reverent attention, in the history of the Egyptians, and of those Israelites, whose "days were consumed in vanity, and their years in trouble," the power of the wrath of God against the workers of iniquity. Let us all diligently seek the privileges of his true people, whom he spares and "pities, as a father doth his children," "for he remembereth that they are but flesh; a wind that passeth away and cometh not again:" (Notes, cii. 11-18.) but let us be careful not to grieve our kind friend by distrust and ingratitude, and forgetfulness of his mercies, which will tend to our own loss. And if we would be useful and honourable in our generation, we must learn to stoop, to labour, to deny ourselves, and to be faithful and diligent in lower situations. For persons of this character have often been advanced to more eminent stations, and if as magistrates or ministers they feed the Lord's flock with integrity and skill, in the judgment of candid and liberal men it will prove no real objection or reproach to them, though they have been educated with Moses, with Amos, and with David, in tending sheep, with Elisha in following the plough, or with the apostles in the fisherman's boat, or even at the receipt of custom. (Notes, Ex. ii. 15-21. 1 Kings xix. 19-21. Am. vii. 15-17. Matt. iv. 18-22. ix. 9.)

NOTES.

PSALM LXXIX. V. 1-5. This psalm unavoidably leads our thoughts to the Babylonish captivity: yet some think that it was written long before; the Holy Spirit directing the psalmist thus to furnish the church with proper meditations, in all such seasons of public calamity. (Notes, Deut. xxxi. xxxii. Ps. xlv. lxxiv.)—When Judah was desolated by hostile armies, the heathen possessed the inheritance which God had given his people. When Jerusalem was taken, the temple was profaned and destroyed; part of the inhabitants were buried in the ruins of the city; and others of them, whose blood was shed abundantly on every side, were left to be devoured by birds and beasts of prey: thus the people of JERUSALEM were exposed to reproach and contempt, because they had provoked him to jealousy by their idolatries. The case hath often been similar, when persecutors and corruptors of the faith have profaned the church, and murdered the saints of God. (Notes, xlv. 17-22. lxxx. 8-13. Jer. viii. 1-3. xxvi. 16-19. Lam. ii. 10-12. iv. 1-6. Ez. ix. 5-7. Mic. iii. 8-12. Rom. viii. 35-39. Rev. xi. 1-12.)—To behold, or even to imagine, heaps of slaughtered bodies, lying unburied, and exposed to birds and beasts of prey, is inexpressibly shocking to humanity: but with what unconcern are we accustomed to view on all sides multitudes "dead in trespasses and sins," torn in pieces and devoured by wild passions, filthy lusts, and infernal spirits, those dogs and vultures of the moral world! Yet, to a discerning eye and a thinking mind, the latter is by far the more melancholy sight of the two. (Horne.) (Marg. Ref.)

V. 6, 7. The Jews deserved their sufferings from God; but their ravagers were extremely unjust, cruel, and impious.—As the church cannot be delivered without the confusion and destruction of implacable persecutors; so we cannot pray for the one, without at least implying the other. (Notes, lxxix. 22-28. Is. lxvii. 17-19.) Jeremiah has the same prayer with little variation; but it is not agreed whether he took it from this psalm, or the psalmist from him; though the latter is most probable. (Note, Jer. x. 23-25.)—The Chaldeans, whose destruction God had foretold, were especially meant: and, so far from worshipping JERUSALEM, they blasphemed him, and cruelly oppressed his worshippers. (Marg. Ref. Note, Lam. iii. 52-56.)

V. 8-13. The psalmist does not plead, as in some other places, that his people, though oppressed and persecuted, were free from the guilt of idolatry and other atrocious crimes: (Note, xlv. 9-22:) but, allowing that they and their fathers had been so criminal as to deserve extirpation, (to which they seemed fast approaching,) he draws all his pleas from the compassion and tender mercies of God; from his regard, or rather zeal, for the honour of his name, which the idolaters would insolently blaspheme, if Israel should be destroyed; from the abject condition to which they were reduced, in which, unless prevented by speedy help, they must perish; from the greatness of JERUSALEM's power; and that he might still have a people to praise his name, to the end of time.—The word rendered "purge away our sins," means cover them with an atonement.—No sacrifices were offered during the captivity, but this was a prayer for the restoration of the temple, and those expiatory oblations that typified the great atonement of Christ, which purgeth away the guilt of all believers, to the praise of the glory of God.—Some expressions towards the close, are like those used by the martyrs and saints in St. John's prophetic vision, or revelation; and it seems obvious to conclude, that the captivity of the church, under the new testament—Babylon, was specially intended by the Holy Spirit. (Notes, Rev. xviii. 4-8. 11-20. xix. 1-6.)—The plea, taken from the greatness of JERUSALEM's power, exactly resembles that doxology which concludes the Lord's prayer: "For thine is the kingdom, and the power, and the glory, for ever and ever. Amen." (Marg. Ref.)

PSALM LXXX.

A. M. 3463.

B. C. 541.

The psalmist prays for the tokens of God's special presence with his people, and deprecates his displeasure. 1-7. The former and present state of Israel is represented by a vine, planted, and flourishing heretofore, but now wasted and trodden down. 8-13. A prayer that the Lord would cause this vine again to prosper, 14-19.

<sup>16</sup>It is burned with fire, it is cut down: <sup>17</sup>they perish at the rebuke of thy countenance.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

We ought to be very thankful, that we are not called to "resist unto blood," and that the murderous rage of persecution is suspended for a season. Yet it is grievous to consider how many, who are heathens in their tempers and conduct, occupy most important stations in the visible church, by which "the holy temple is defiled," and Christianity is exposed to the reproach and scorn of infidels. It is also lamentable, that the horrors and carnage of war are so much known, betwixt nations professing themselves the disciples of "the Prince of peace," and that ambition and avarice shed the blood of Christians like water on every side, and render Jerusalem, as it were, "a heap of ruins." (Note, Lam. iv. 1, 2.)—The believer has also continual cause to lament, that indwelling sin, and the incursions of temptation, often pollute his body and soul, which are "the temple of God." But every trouble, personal or public, springs from the anger of God, whom we often provoke to jealousy by our idolatrous attachments to earthly objects. We should therefore first deprecate his wrath, and seek forgiveness of our iniquities; and beseech "the God of our salvation" to cleanse away the pollution and the guilt of our sins: and then he will prevent us with his tender mercies, and deliver us, however low we may be brought. When our calamities, or those of the church, give occasion to infidels and blasphemers to reproach the gospel, or to enquire "Where is their God?" we have got a prevailing plea in prayer; for wherefore should persons of this character have cause given them to triumph over the Lord's servants? (Notes, xlii. 1-3. 9, 10. cxv. 1, 2.) But we have no cause to be uneasy on our own account, if we be reproached for our piety or our sufferings: we should chiefly fear being reproached for acting inconsistently with our profession. We ought, however, to pray for the deliverance of the church from the contempt, as well as oppressions, of her enemies; and in so doing, should our prayers for their conversion not be granted, they will eventually be answered in the ruin of all such as "devour Jacob, and lay waste his dwelling-place."—The blood of JEHOVAH's servants will at length be avenged sevenfold upon those who shed it, and do not repent; and his wrath will be poured out upon all kingdoms, families, and persons, who have not known, or called upon, his name. But by the greatness of his power, and for the glory of his name, he will rescue his oppressed people: their sighing in captivity, and in imprisonment, comes before him; and he will either preserve the lives of those whom persecutors appoint to die, or he will receive them to glory. So that the harmless "sheep of his pasture will give him thanks for ever," according to the desire of their hearts; a succession of believers shall praise him to all generations; and the cause of God, however now run down, will finally triumph upon earth, as well as eternally in heaven.

NOTES.

PSALM LXXX. Title. (Marg. Ref.) Many are of opinion, that this psalm was written, at the time when Jerusalem was destroyed by Nebuchadnezzar: but some think, that it relates to the desolations made by Sennacherib. Because, after the destruction of the city and temple by Nebuchadnezzar, God no longer "dwelt between the cherubim," above the mercy-seat, (1:) as the ark and mercy-seat, and the cherubim of gold, were destroyed, and never replaced; nor is the Lord, ever after that event, thus spoken of in Scripture; but Hezekiah, praying against Sennacherib, addressed God by this very title. (Is. xxxvii. 16, 17.)—The Septuagint also expressly calls this, "A psalm against the Assyrian." Again, Ephraim and Manasseh, (2:) seem to have had but little concern in the affairs of Judah, at the time of the Babylonian captivity: but during the reign of Hezekiah, many of these, and the other tribes constituting the kingdom of Israel, accepted of his invitation, joined the Jews in keeping the passover, and afterwards assisted in breaking down the idolatrous high places and altars, not only in Judah, and in Benjamin as connected with Judah; but likewise in Ephraim and Manasseh, (Notes, 2 Chr. xxx. xxxi. 1.)—Yet soon after, Sennacherib invaded the land, reduced the remnant of the ten tribes to abject slavery, invaded Judah, and threatened to destroy Jerusalem and the temple. It was therefore natural, at this crisis, to implore, that God would stir up his strength, and come to save Judah: and thus shew his glory, in the presence of Benjamin, in whose lot part of Jerusalem and of the temple was situated; and also before Ephraim and Manasseh, to encourage them, and to shew that God approved Hezekiah's zeal for reformation.

V. 1. The psalmist seems to have offered this prayer, not for Judah only, but for the whole nation of Israel, including the ten tribes, which were subjugated, carried captive, and scattered by the Assyrians. JEHOVAH "the Shepherd of Israel," the protector, ruler, and guide of that favoured nation, had led Joseph, as well as Judah, like a flock, out of Egypt, through the desert and into Canaan: (Notes, xxiii. 1-3. lxxvii. 19, 20. Is. xl. 9-11. lxxiii. 11-14:) and there he dwelt between the cherubim, at Shiloh, in the tribe of Ephraim, before the ark was stationed at Jerusalem. (Marg. Ref.) The psalmist therefore, remembering these ancient displays of the glory of God in the midst of his people, implores him again to shine forth in the splendour of his power, truth, and love; to dismay their enemies, and to rescue and cheer his worshippers. This divine interposition is represented by the breaking forth of the sun after a dismal tempest, and that pleasing change which ensues. (Notes, 2 Sam. xxiii. 3, 4. Mal. iv. 2, 3.)

V. 2. These three tribes marched immediately after the ark and the cherubim, by divine appointment, in the wilderness, which seems to be here alluded to. (Num. ii. 17-24.) Stir up, &c. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 3. In order to renewed prosperity and comfort, the psalmist was deeply convinced, that a revival of pure religion was necessary; and therefore he repeatedly prayed, and thus taught the people to pray, for converting grace, in order that God might cause "his face to shine on them," &c. (7-19. Notes, iv. 6. lxxxv. 4. Num. vi. 24-26. Jer. xxxi. 18-20. Lam. v. 19-22.)

V. 4. This verse seems to mark out the time of Sennacherib's invasion, and his rapid success, notwithstanding the zeal of Hezekiah, Isaiah, and others for reformation, and their continual prayers for the interposition of God in behalf of his people. 'The faithful fear God's anger, when they perceive that their prayers are not forthwith heard.' (Notes, 2 Kings xviii. 16. 13-17. xix. 1-4. (14-19.)

V. 5, 6. The afflictions of Israel were so heavy and of such long continuance, that their bread seemed to be dipped in, and their cup filled to the brim with, their tears; whilst their neighbours contended about dividing their spoil, and derided their miseries. (Marg. Ref. Notes, 2 Kings xviii. 23-27.) The original word for "great measure," is supposed to mean a large cup, much larger than those which were commonly used to drink from. (Notes, cii. 3-11.)

V. 8-13. The nation of Israel, brought out of Egypt, planted in Canaan, (the ancient inhabitants having been extirpated to make room for it,) and favoured with many great advantages, temporal and spiritual, above all other nations, is here represented under the emblem of a vine, planted in a well-cultivated vineyard. (Marg. Ref.) The people so multiplied and prospered, especially in the days of David and Solomon, that this vine, having taken deep root, overspread the whole country, from the Mediterranean sea to the Euphrates; and its luxuriant branches grew strong like cedars, or covered the cedars to the top, by clinging to them. But nothing is here said of its fruitfulness; for it brought forth wild grapes. (Notes, Is. v. 1-7. Jer. ii. 20, 21.) This was the reason, why the heathen were allowed to desolate the land, as a wild boar would waste a vineyard; why the Romans were afterwards permitted to destroy Jerusalem; and why the Lord took from the Jews their peculiar privileges, and conferred them on the Gentile churches. (Notes, lxxxix. 38-51. Matt. xxi. 33-44.)—The vine is a constant emblem of the church of Christ, under every dispensation. It is a feeble tree, which needs support, and is of no value except for its excellent fruit. (Notes, Ez. xv.) It produces a vast quantity of luxuriant branches, which not only yield no grapes, but must be pruned away, or they will hinder those upon the fruitful branches from ripening. Thus mere professors of Christianity are branches of the true vine, which must be taken away, and cast into the fire, in order that true believers may become more abundantly fruitful. (Notes, John xv. 1-8.) Goodly cedars. (10.) "Cedars of God." (Marg. Note, civ. 16.)

V. 14, 15. (Marg. Ref.) The family of David, (which God had advanced and prospered for the good of Israel, and for his own glory,) as typical of

19 <sup>e</sup>Turn us again, O LORD God of hosts, <sup>f</sup>cause thy face to shine; and we shall be saved.

PSALM LXXXI.

An exhortation to praise God with psalms and musical instruments, especially on the solemn feasts, 1.—3. God demanded this, because of his kindness to Israel, 4.—7. He commands the people to renounce idolatry, and trust on him alone, and complain of their disobedience; which had turned to their own loss, 8.—16.

Lam. ii. 6. Nah. i. 15.

Christ himself, even the promised Messiah, seems to have been principally intended. The Septuagint translates it, 'The son of man.' (17.)—'The son, whom thou hast made strong for thyself.' (Heb. Notes, lxxxix. 19, 37.)

V. 16. The vine, above described, (or the nation which God had brought out of Egypt, and planted in Canaan;) was in great measure cut down and burned with fire, by the dispersion of the ten tribes, and the success of the Assyrians in Judah: and though a remnant still remained, and a strong branch of David's race; yet if the anger of God were not turned away from them, they likewise must soon perish. (Notes, 2 Kings xix. 4, 30, 31.)

V. 17, 18. This may imply a request that God would uphold, strengthen, and defend his king, of David's race, on the throne of Judah, for the protection of his people, and the maintenance of true religion. (Note, 2 Kings xix. 15—19.) But "the man of God's right hand," "the son of man, &c." point out the promised Messiah very clearly, and may be considered as a prayer of the church for his coming, as "the power of God," for the conversion of sinners, and the salvation of his people. (Note, 14, 15.) They, who refer the psalm to the Babylonish captivity, interpret the preceding verse of the subversion of the kingdom, in the family of David, after the death of Josiah: and these verses as a prayer for another king of the same race to be advanced to the throne; in order that the people might be induced, and encouraged, to adhere to the worship of God, and to call on him in every time of trouble.

V. 19. An increase of earnestness in prayer seems discernible in comparing the three repetitions of this important request. (Notes, 3, 7.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

He who dwelleth on the mercy-seat, is the good shepherd of his people, and leads them as a valued flock with all attention and tenderness. In all troubles and dangers, let us beseech him to "shine upon our souls," and upon our path, that we may be cheered and directed by his presence and favour; and let us treat him continually to "stir up his strength, and come and save us." But we can neither expect the comforts of his love, nor the protection of his powerful arm, except we are partakers of his converting grace. When we discover our need of this invaluable blessing, we ought to pray earnestly for it; the same must be our conduct when we have lost our comfort, and are exposed to rebukes by having relapsed into sin, and are become sensible of the necessity of returning to the Lord our rest; (Notes, i. 12, 13. cxvi. 7;) and, in all public calamities of churches or nations, we must observe the same order, and pray to be prepared, by converting grace, for returning comfort and prosperity.—The Lord is really angry at the prayers of the hypocrite, who employs them as a cloak for his iniquity; but not with those of any sinner, however vile, who sincerely seeks his mercy and grace. (Note, Prov. xv. 8, 9.) Yet, whilst he proves our sincerity, and increases our humility and fervency, by delays, we often think that he is angry against our prayers, and will not accept them; but we shall certainly find the contrary, if we persevere in asking and seeking.—The church of God in times of grievous oppressions, and the believer in times of darkness and distress, (especially when occasioned by sin,) may, for a while, be sunk in sorrows, and exposed to contempt and reproach, but when this leads to repentance, having sown in tears, they will reap in more abundant joy. (Notes, cxxvi. 5, 6. Matt. v. 4. 2 Cor. vii. 7—11.)—When we, in this favoured land, consider our manifold advantages, and our very disproportionate improvement of them, we shall perceive great cause for humiliation. We are planted, as in a well-cultivated enclosure, with every means of being fruitful in the works of righteousness; but, alas! the useless leaves of profession, and the empty boughs of notions and forms, abound far more than substantial piety and charity. The Christian religion, also, as planted by the apostles and primitive evangelists, took deep root, and spread very wide, so that it hath filled many nations, and it hath too generally proved an empty vine. The Lord's zeal for the honour of his own truth, precepts, and ordinances may be pleaded with him as a reason, why he should not break down the hedges, and permit infidels and heretics to root up the vineyard; and may suggest an inquiry why he permits them so long to practise and prosper. But when we consider the state of the purest parts of the visible church, we cannot wonder that we are visited with sharp corrections. He, however, who is not only the strongest branch, but the root and stem of the vine; who is "the man of God's right hand," "the son of

The vine cannot, therefore, be ruined, nor can any fruitful branch perish, but the unfruitful will be cut off and cast into the fire. Let us, then, come to him, and abide in him, "without whom we can do nothing;" let us beg of him to uphold and strengthen us, that we may not go back from him: and let us still call upon his name, in behalf of ourselves, and of the whole church; "Turn us again, O Lord God of hosts, cause thy face to shine, and we shall be saved."

NOTES.

PSALM LXXXI. V. 1.—5. It is probable that this psalm was composed in the time of David, when the ark had been removed to mount Zion; and that it was especially intended for the new moons, and that in particular which began the seventh month, called the feast of trumpets, or the new year, according to the old computation. (Notes, Ex. xii. 2. Lev. xxiii. 24, 25. Num. x. 2—10. xxi. 1—6.) Some think that, on this day, Moses came down from the mount the second time, with the tables of the law, and full orders to erect a tabernacle, in the most sacred place of which these tables might be placed, in the ark of the covenant, and covered with the mercy-seat, over which the glory of God, as dwelling among his people, was displayed; and that this day was observed as a memorial of that event, and a testimony of the relation which subsisted between God and Israel.—The word rendered "psalm," may signify the instruments of psalmody, some of which are afterwards enumerated.—Joseph's family was counted the chief, before that of Judah was preferred. No doubt the descendants of Joseph were counted the chief, during most of the time that the Israelites continued in Egypt, as Joseph had there been the protector of the whole family.—God went through the land of Egypt, destroying all the first-born; or against the land, in all the plagues which he inflicted; (Notes, Ex. xi. 4, 5. xii. 11—14. 29, 30;) yet the feast of trumpets did not take place till almost seven months after Israel left Egypt; for their deliverance was in some sense incomplete, till Moses descended the second time from the mount, with tokens of God's reconciliation to his offending people.—In the last clause, the psalmist evidently speaks in the name of the nation, or the church of God, a corporate body from age to age. It seems that the Israelites did not understand the language of their haughty oppressors, which must have tended to render their bondage more distressing. (Notes, cxiv. 1, 2. Gen. xlii. 23.)

V. 6. It is evident that the Lord himself speaks, through the remainder of the psalm, though the change of person is not noticed. Some suppose that the voice of God, with which Israel in Egypt was unacquainted, was meant by "the language which he understood not;" and then this, and the following verses, may be considered as a recapitulation of God's messages to the nation, by Moses, during the events attending his deliverance.—God then said concerning Israel, "I remove his shoulder," &c.—It is not certain what is meant by "the pots;" whether any earthen vessels which the Israelites were employed to make, or the kilns in which the bricks were burnt; or the pots in which the food for this immense number of slaves was prepared, the flesh-pots which they afterwards regretted. (Note, Ex. xvi. 1—3.)

V. 7. (Marg. Ref.) The secret, &c. Some think that this refers to the cloudy pillar, from the hidden recess of which JEHOVAH spake in mercy to his people, and in thunder to his enemies. But, perhaps, mount Sinai is meant, from whose inaccessible summit, out of the midst of the thunder and lightning, the Lord spake the ten commandments; the first of which is afterwards referred to. (10. Notes, Ex. xix. xx.)

I proved, &c. (Notes, Ex. xvii. 1—7. Num. xx. 2—13.)

V. 8—10. The old translation of these verses seems as literal as the present version, and more expressive: "Hear, O my people, and I will protest unto thee; O Israel, if thou wilt hearken unto me, and wilt have no strange god in thee, neither worship any strange god; (For I am the LORD thy God, which brought thee out of the land of Egypt;) open thy mouth wide, and I will fill it." "If thou adherest to the worship of JEHOVAH alone, according to the terms of the national covenant, I will grant the largest desires of thy heart, and requests of thy lips."—According to the present translation of the ninth verse, the future is evidently put for the imperative; and it means, "Let no strange God," &c. "There will be no need, I will abundantly supply all thy wants;"

14 <sup>5</sup>I should soon have subdued their enemies, and <sup>6</sup>turned my hand against their adversaries.

15 <sup>7</sup>The haters of the LORD should have <sup>8</sup>submitted themselves unto him: but <sup>9</sup>their time should have endured for ever.

16 He should have <sup>10</sup>fed them also with the <sup>11</sup>finest of the wheat: and with <sup>12</sup>honey out of the rock should I have satisfied thee.

PSALM LXXXII.

The psalmist reminds magistrates of God's authority over them, and urges them to do their duty, 1-4. He reproves their ignorance and wickedness, and warns them of their approaching doom, 5-7. He prays for the establishment of God's kingdom, 8.

A Psalm *of Asaph.

and the larger their desires and expectations were, and the more copious and comprehensive their prayers, the more abundantly would they receive from his all-sufficiency.—It is almost impossible not to think in this place of our Lord's address to the Jews, "If any man thirst, let him come unto me and drink." (Note, John vii. 37-39. Marg. Ref.)—"I JEHOVAH, who brought thee out of the land of Egypt, am thy God." (10.) "With such an omnipotent and all-sufficient protector and friend, thou canst not want any other god." (Notes, Ec. xx. 7-9. 17-22.)

V. 11, 12. Israel, as a nation, were the people of God, by profession, covenant, and the strongest obligations; but they were not so by their own choice of him. They would not have him for their portion, and their Lord; but expected more advantages from their dumb idols than from him; and, therefore, they were left to be judiciously deceived, hardened, and ruined, as the just punishment of their sins.—Thus Wisdom, (that is, Christ,) complains, that men would none of her counsel; yea, they despised and hated her, and this was the cause of their destruction. (Notes, Prov. i. 19-31. Acts vii. 37-43. Rom. i. 24-27. 2 Thes. ii. 8-12.)

V. 13. (Notes, Deut. v. 28, 29. xxxii. 29.) Such expressions denote the Lord's willingness to receive returning sinners, and the delight which he takes in shewing mercy, and doing good, and in the faith and obedience of his people; and they prove, that the ruin of sinners is altogether the effect of their own pride and obstinacy. But it would be absurd to draw inferences from them, which cannot consist with other parts of Scripture. (Notes, Is. xlviii. 17-19. Ez. xviii. 23. xxxiii. 11. 1 Tim. ii. 3, 4.)—"One cannot help observing the similitude between the complaint here uttered, and one which hath since been breathed forth over the same people; "O Jerusalem, Jerusalem, how often would I have gathered thy children together, even as a hen gathereth her chickens under her wings, and ye would not!" (Bp. Horne.) Note, Matt. xxiii. 37-39.)

V. 14, 15. "I should in a short time have quelled all their enemies; and by one victory after another have quite destroyed their adversaries.—All that maligned their prosperity, and set themselves against the design of the LORD to make them victorious over their enemies, should have been so daunted, that they should have dissembled their hatred, and been forced at least to counterfeit submission; but his people should have seen most blessed days, and enjoyed a substantial and durable happiness, without any interruption." (Bp. Patrick.)—The nation of Israel, if they had been obedient, would have possessed their privileges to the coming of Christ, and have been then incorporated into his church, which shall continue on earth to the end of time, and in heaven to all eternity.—Submitted, &c. Lied. (Marg. Note, lxxi. 1-3.)

V. 16. (Note, Deut. xxxii. 13, 14. Marg. Ref.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

It is our duty and privilege to attend on the ordinances of God, and to abound in praise and thanksgiving: and we should excite one another to these pleasant services, embracing every opportunity for them, and improving all our ability in them. For the Lord is the strength of his people; and all the worship which we can render is far beneath his glorious excellencies; and our immense obligations to him, especially in our redemption from wrath and sin. When therefore he commands, and intimates his acceptance of, this reasonable service, he testifies his mercy and condescending love to us. For we ought never to forget the base and ruinous drudgery to which Satan had reduced us; or our rebellions against God, for which we deserved to have been left the bond-slaves of this cruel tyrant, and to have had our final portion with him. But when in distress of conscience we are led to cry for deliverance, the Lord answereth our prayers, and sets us at liberty.—As the giving of the law from Mount Sinai, and the trials of Israel in the wilderness, were proofs of the Lord's peculiar regard to that people; so, humiliating convictions of sin, and sharp afflictions, are generally, and the law written in our heart is always, evidential of the love of God to our souls.—But he speaks to many, both by the awful requirements and sanctions of his law, and by the invitations and promises of his gospel, and even to many who profess themselves his people, who yet will not hearken to his voice, or have him for their portion; for they foolishly expect more satisfaction from their sins, than from the all-sufficient God. Thus they provoke him to give them up to their own heart's lust, and to leave them to their perverse choice: and then, whilst they prosper in wickedness, and are envied by their fellow-sinners, they ripen apace for eternal ruin. But the Lord delighteth in the conversion of sinners, and in the faith and obedience of his people. They may desire and ask as much as they will; and he will answer and exceed their expectations; their enemies shall be subdued; and their souls satisfied with those unspeakable blessings, which flow from "the rock of salvation;" their bodies also shall be fed with "food convenient for them," and their eternal inheritance secured to them; whilst all the haters of the Lord shall fall under his power, and perish for ever. May he then incline our hearts to obey his call, and walk in his ways: and may he enlarge and assist our prayers; that, being delivered from our enemies, we may "open our mouths wide," to take in the waters of life and salvation, and so drink and live for ever.

NOTES.

PSALM LXXXII. V. 1. JEHOVAH, who judgeth the principalities and powers of the invisible world, will call to account the greatest of those, who exercise dominion over their fellow-creatures on earth. They seem as gods to their subjects, and they indeed are the Lord's appointed viceregents: (Notes, 6. Rom. xiii. 1-7.) but they are the subjects of his kingdom, even as other men; and he is especially at all times present in their courts, to animadvert on the justice or injustice of their decisions; to receive appeals from their sentence, when unrighteous, and to call them to a strict account if they abuse their power. (Marg. Ref.)—It is not known by whom, or when, this psalm was written; some date it in David's time, and others in that of Hezekiah.

V. 2-4. Is it not time to leave off your partiality, and no longer to favour a bad cause, because a man is rich and great; and can either give you a large bribe, if you will judge it for him, or do you mischief if you give sentence against him?—"Your duty is to do equal justice to all men that come before you; and to take particular care, that the poor and the fatherless, who have no money to give, nor any friend to solicit, and men of low condition, be not unjustly condemned." (Bp. Patrick.) (Notes, lviii. 1, 2. Ez. xxiii. 6-9. 2 Chr. xix. 5-11. Prov. xviii. 5.) (Marg. Ref.)

V. 5. They will not study the laws of God; or if they do, will not think it their interest to be governed by them;—insomuch, that the foundations of the kingdom, which are justice and truth, are shaken; all things are in confusion, and in danger to come to utter ruin." (Bp. Patrick.) (Marg. Ref.)

V. 6-7. The rulers of Israel, as especially appointed by JEHOVAH to be his representatives, to judge according to his law, and to be types of his anointed, were honoured with this high title; in which other magistrates share, in proportion to their religious advantages. But though outwardly honoured as gods, as children of the Most High, and as representing the Son of God himself; yet, as they in general abused these distinctions, the Lord would soon shew them their weakness, as mean mortal men; and leave them to be cast down from their dignity, like one of the princes, whom Israel crushed when they came up out of Egypt, or, in their subsequent wars. (lxxxiii. Notes, 1 John x. 32-39.)

V. 8. "Seeing no amendment, he desireth God to undertake the matter, and do justice himself."—This verse, however, seems to be a prophetic prayer for the coming of the Messiah, and the conversion of the nations to him. (Notes, ii. 7-9. lxxii. 8-11. lxxxvi. 9. xcvi. 7-9. Rev. xi. 15-18.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The authority of God should be acknowledged, honoured, and submitted to, in those governors whom his providence places over us. But they also must be reminded, that they are only viceroys of the King of heaven, bound under the strictest obligations, and the most awful responsibility, to do his will, and copy his example; that he witnesseth the use which they make of their authority, and will judge them for it; and that if with present impunity, they "judge unjustly, and accept the persons of the wicked," they will have a most terrible sentence denounced on them at last.—These plain truths are too generally forgotten, or discredited, by those in authority: they know not, because they "will not understand;" therefore they walk on still in darkness: (Note, John iii. 19-21.) and the perversion of law and justice, through their impiety and iniquity, subverts the foundations of social felicity, and enhances exceedingly the miseries of mankind. God hath indeed honoured rulers, (especially those placed over his people,) by entrusting to them, as it were, a share of his authority, and favouring them, as children, with a portion of his inheritance: and honourable and happy are they, who, out of a regard to him, "defend the poor and fatherless," do justice to the afflicted and needy, and deliver them out of the hands of the wicked.—But, as for ungodly rulers, their disgrace and misery will equal their present abused distinctions; and they will feel the insignificance of that pre-eminence, which made them forget that they were men, when death shall arrest them, and hurry them to judgment; and they shall be condemned with those princes who made war against Israel of old.—We should, however, be thankful for the blessings of civil government, which, with all its defects, is of great advantage to mankind. And we should pray for our rulers, and leave such as misbehave to the judgment of God. But, considering the state of affairs in the world, from the beginning hitherto, we have need, even on that account, to pray most earnestly and constantly, that the Lord Jesus would arise, and take possession of his inheritance, and rule over all nations in truth, righteousness, and peace.

NOTES.

PSALM LXXXIII. V. 1-4. It is generally, and with probability, conjectured, that this psalm was written, (perhaps by some of Asaph's descendants,) in the reign of Jehoshaphat, when a most formidable confederacy was formed against him; and when Judah was invaded by a very large army composed of many nations, of whom the Moabites and Ammonites seem to have been the principal, and the others their allies: and it appears, that enmity to God and religion, excited by Jehoshaphat's zeal for reformation, had a considerable effect in exciting them against him. (Notes, 2 Chr. xx. 1-4.) So that it was, in fact, the cause of God which they opposed; uniting crafty policy with powerful exertions, entirely to destroy his people, and to blot out the memorial of them from the earth. (Notes, Esth. iii. 6-15.) The term "hidden ones," seems to denote the Lord's peculiar people, who were hidden under his immediate protection from the devices of their enemies. (Marg. Ref.)—Some render the words "hidden things," understanding them, of the treasures reposit in the treasuries of the temple.

V. 6-8. (Marg. Ref.) Assur, (or the Assyrians,) was called in by the other confederates, as a powerful ally, to ensure the destruction of the hated nation.

V. 9-11. (Notes, Judg. iv. —viii.) Endor lay in the north of Canaan, near the place in which Sisera's army was destroyed. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 12. "The houses of God" seem to denote, not only the temple and its out-buildings: but also the palaces and houses, in which the princes, priests, and chief persons of God's people, dwelt. It is not certain, that any buildings for the public worship of God, (like the synagogues of later ages,) were at this time erected. (Note, lxxiv. 8.) But perhaps these idolaters might consider the high places as houses of God, especially such as were not used in idolatry. (Note, 2 Kings xvii. 22.)

V. 13-18. So many of the verbs in this passage are imperative, that it must be interpreted as a prayer: but it should be observed, that the persons prayed against were the enemies and haters of God, who sought with implacable malice to extirpate his people, and destroy true religion; and, that the honour of God, and the interests of truth and righteousness, required this example of severity. The images employed are very striking, and are best explained by the marginal references. The expression, "that they may seek thy name," implies, that the imprecation was only meant, in the strongest sense, on the supposition that the invaders remained incorrigible in enmity to God, in which case, "Let them be confounded and troubled for ever," &c.: that men of other nations may take warning, and learn by their doom, that JEHOVAH the God of Israel, alone, is the almighty Lord and Sovereign of the whole earth; and not merely the local deity of one nation.

PSALM LXXXIV.

The psalmist expresses his strong affection for the courts of God, 1-3. He shews the blessedness of those who attend there, or cordially resort thither, 4-7. He prays to be restored to them; and celebrates the great goodness of God to his people, 8-12.

sentiments, readily unite against the church. The precise Pharisee, the time-serving Herodian, and the infidel Sadducee, agreed to hate and oppose Christ: Herod and Pilate, though before at enmity, were made friends, as being of one mind to treat Jesus with contempt: (Notes, Matt. xvi. 1-4. xxii. 15-33. Luke xxiii. 6-10.) and hypocrisy and profaneness, superstition and scepticism, and even enthusiasm and atheism, often confederate against his humbling doctrine and holy cause. For the consultation has been from the beginning, how to extirpate the church, that neither preacher nor professor of the truth should be left, and "that the name of Israel should be had no more in remembrance." (Notes, Acts v. 17-28.) But whatever arrogance, tumult, subtlety, or resolution, may be found among those who hate the Lord, and would lay hands on his worshippers, and "take to themselves his houses in possession;" their intentions must ultimately be frustrated. His people, whose "life is hid with Christ in God," and whose excellency is equally hidden from the carnal eye, are safe under his protection. (Note, Col. iii. 1-4.)—Whilst the Lord is still and keeps silence, and persecutors insult and triumph, the apparent danger often excites believers to great fervency in prayer; and then in due time he arises to plead their cause: so that the doom of the ancient enemies of the church will be that of all others to the end of the world; or one still more dreadful. For such are "vessels of wrath fitted for destruction, even as a bowl is fitted to roll impetuously down a declivity; as stubble to be driven before a vehement wind; or as the dry wood, thorns, and brambles upon the mountains, are fitted to be consumed by the flames." (Note, Luke xxiii. 26-31.) Thus the stormy tempest of divine vengeance will persecute them with dreadful consternation into "the fire prepared for the devil and his angels;" unless they be so humbled, and ashamed of their sins, as to repent, and seek the pardoning mercy of their offended Lord: for assuredly all impenitent sinners shall be troubled, and ashamed, and perish for ever.—The Lord will be glorified in the punishments which he inflicts: if present judgments fail of bringing those who suffer them to repentance, they are often so evidential of his power and justice, as to warn others to flee from his wrath, and seek his favour: and doubtless the final punishment of the wicked will answer most important purposes, throughout the universal and everlasting kingdom of God. But may we so know, that "he whose name is JEHOVAH, is most high over all the earth," as to fear his powerful wrath, seek his inestimable favour, trust his mercy and grace, and yield ourselves to be his willing and devoted worshippers and servants! and may we chiefly seek the destruction of those tumultuous and confederated enemies, our "fleshy lusts, which war against the soul."

NOTES.

PSALM LXXXIV. V. 1, 2. It is not said, by whom, or on what occasion, this psalm was written: but it is generally thought, that David composed it, when driven from Jerusalem by Absalom's rebellion. (Notes, xlii. xliii. lxxii.) Yet this is by no means certain: and some think that it was made by some pious Levite, in the days of Hezekiah, when kept from the temple by the Assyrian army.—The psalmist, however, reflecting with regret on the beauties of the sanctuary, and the delight which he had taken in attending on the ordinances there administered; not only breaks out in the language of strong and ardent desire, to be restored to the courts of God; but declares that his soul so earnestly longed after the living God himself, and the enjoyment of his love, that his body also was affected by it. (Notes, lxxiii. 25-28. cix. 19-21. 80, 81. Cant. ii. 5. v. 8.) Or he may mean, that he longed to "present his body as a living sacrifice," by such external acts of worship as would most suitably express the fervent affections of his soul.—Living God. (2.) (Notes, Josh. iii. 10-13. 1 Sam. xvii. 25, 26. Jer. x. 9, 10. Dan. vi. 25-28. 1 Thes. i. 9, 10.)

V. 3. The psalmist seems here to envy the birds their privilege of building their nests at, or near to, the altars of God; (meaning the tabernacle or temple, where were the altar of burnt-offering and the altar of incense,) while he was driven as an exile to a great distance from them. Yet, as it can scarcely be conceived, that the birds were left unmolested in their nests to hatch and brood their young, at the altar of God, in the days of David; it has been supposed, that he only meant, that the birds found in their nests that tranquillity, repose, and satisfaction, which the ordinances of God had afforded him, but of which he was now deprived. (Note, Matt. viii. 18-20.)—My King, &c. (Notes, xlv. 4. xlv. 1. xlv. 1. 2. Matt. xxv. 34-40.)

4. Some of the priests and Levites dwelt continually at the sanctuary, which to a carnal mind might appear a wearisome confinement: but the psalmist deemed them very happy; and those also who resided so near to the courts of God, that they could constantly join in the praises and adorations there presented, and who counted this their delightful employment. (Notes, 10. xxvi. 9-11. xxvii. 4-6. cxxxiv. cxxxv. 1-3. 1 Chr. xvi. 37-43.) The Septuagint renders the latter clause; "They will praise thee for ever and ever," by the strongest term for eternity contained in the Greek language; and no doubt the psalmist counted those happy who perpetually praised God at the sanctuary on earth; because this was both a preparation for the eternal worship of heaven, and an earnest of it. (Notes, xxx. 11. 12. xlv. 1. 2. clxvi. 2.)

V. 5. (Notes, 11. 12. i. 1-3. xxxii. 1. 2. lxx. 4.) 'Happy also is that man, (how mean soever his outward condition be,) who, relying on the Divine protection, (Ex. xxxiv. 24;) goes up three times a year to the solemn feasts at Jerusalem; or, when debarred that liberty, is one of those devout persons, whose hearts are more in the high ways that lead thither, than at their own homes. (Bp. Patrick).—The man who, trusting in God for strength and protection, pressed through dangers and difficulties, from cordial love to the courts of God, aptly represented those who, being strong in the Lord, walk with alacrity in his ways, aspiring after, and longing for, the joys of heaven. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 6, 7. 'The valley of Baca, or of mulberry-trees, was a barren place: so that they which passed through must dig pits for water; signifying that no lets can hinder them, that are fully bent to come to Christ's church; neither yet will God ever fail them. "Some translate "Baca," weeping, or misery: and probably is a dreary valley, through which from some parts of the land the people must pass, in going up to Jerusalem: but in one way or other, they, who from regard to the ordinances of God, encountered the difficulty, were carried well through it. The word rendered "the pools," signifies also blessings; and the clause may well be rendered, "The rain of blessings covereth them;" not only refreshing rain, in plenty, to cool the ground and supply them with waters, but also showers of "blessings," or heavenly consolations. (Ex. xxxiv. 26.) Thus they were enabled to proceed with increasing vigour and alacrity; till each of them appeared before God in his courts on mount Zion; or, till "the God of gods appeared to them in Zion," manifesting his glory, and communicating spiritual blessings through his holy ordinances. (Notes, Job xvii. 8, 9. Is. xl. 27-31.)—The whole description may be properly accommodated to the Christian's pilgrimage, through this vale of tears to the felicity of heaven.

V. 8, 9. The power of the LORD God of hosts to repel every enemy, and remove every obstacle, and his readiness to hear the requests of the patriarch Jacob and his descendants, encouraged the psalmist's earnest prayer, to be permitted, according to the desire of his heart, to return to the courts of God. (Notes, Gen. xxxii. 9-12. 24-30. Hos. xii. 3-6.)—He also entreated him to "look on the face of his anointed;" his Messiah; 'his Christ, the king, as the type of Christ;' or 'for Christ's sake, whom I represent.' If David wrote this psalm, he might mean to request God, that he would favour his king, whom he had expressly chosen, and ordered to be anointed; and not suffer a rebel and an usurper to prevail against him. (Notes, i. 1-6.) But he is generally supposed to have looked forward to the promised Messiah, of whom he was the type and progenitor: and indeed he might plead this as a powerful argument why the Lord should rescue him from his enemies, that the Messiah was to descend from him; and he might expect that the root should be preserved for the sake of that illustrious branch. (Notes, Is. vi. 13. vii. 2. lxx. 8-10. Matt. xxv. 10, 22.)

V. 10. (Marg. Ref. Notes, Luke ii. 41-52. Rom. viii. 5-9. Jam. ii. 1-4. Rev. iii. 12, 13.) 'I would rather choose to be in the lowest and basest room in thy holy tabernacle, than to be settled in whatsoever dignity out of the bounds of thy church.' (Hall.)

12 O LORD of hosts, <sup>a</sup>blessed is the man that trusteth in thee.

V. 11, 12. The sun enlightens, warms, enlivens, and fructifies the face of the earth: thus the Lord gives light, comfort, and fruitfulness to those on whom he shines with the beams of his saving grace. This sun may indeed be clouded or eclipsed; but it remains unchanged, and will soon burst forth again, as if with increasing splendour. (Notes, 2 Sam. xxiii. 3, 4. Mal. iv. 2, 3.)—In this world the Lord gives "grace," which, as a sun, he ripens into "glory" in the world above; (Notes, lxxiii. 23-28. Rom. v. 1, 2;) while, as a shield, he protects the happy man who trusts in him, against all assailants, however formidable; and withholds nothing truly good from any who walk before him in truth. (Marg. Ref. Notes, Gen. xv. 1. Deut. xxxiii. 29. 2 Sam. xii. 8. Matt. vi. 33. 34. 1 Tim. iv. 6-10.)—This the psalmist knew, which cheered his spirits amidst his tribulations, and while he waited the answer to his prayers.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

Divine ordinances are the believer's solace in this evil world; because in them he communes with "the living God," and enjoys his gracious presence. (Notes, cxiii. 1, 2. Is. lviii. 13, 14.) This renders his tabernacles so amiable in his eyes, and dear to his heart: this causes him to value the privilege of attending them; and to regret, as the greatest calamity, the banishment or confinement from them. Indeed the Lord himself is "the rest" of his people; (Notes, xc. 1, 2. xci. 1, 2. cxvi. 7;) but on earth they cannot approach him, except through his appointed means of grace; so that these are to their souls, as the nest to the bird, which resorts thither, and is contented and easy, but is unsettled when absent; yet this is only an earnest of the happiness of heaven, where the blessed inhabitants are always praising their God. But how can they dream of entering that holy habitation, and sharing its pure pleasures and society, who complain of the worship of God on earth as a tedious and wearisome task? (Note, Am. viii. 4-10:) who think those wretched, that spend all their days in his service; because they share not the carnal pleasure and dissipations, which themselves prefer to the employment of angels? But not only are they happy, who have arrived at heaven: they likewise may be congratulated, who have set out, with the desire of their hearts, in search of that felicity; and who, making the Lord their strength, walk with pleasure in his ways, and approve them in their hearts. They may have to pass through many a valley of weeping, and many a thirsty desert: but wells of salvation shall be opened for them, and consolations sent for their support. The journey itself, and the prospect of its happy end, will revive their hearts; they shall go from strength to strength, with increasing cheerfulness and confidence, till every one of them arrives safe in the holy city, to appear before God, to see him as he is, and to be for ever with him, and like unto him. (Note, 1 John iii. 1-3.) May the Lord then incline the heart of every one of us to set out and proceed with alacrity in this pilgrimage, and may he defend us through it: may we pray without ceasing, (through the great Mediator, the Lord's anointed; whose face he beholds, and whose intercession he delights in,) for ourselves and for all our fellow-travellers. Thus we shall learn to count one day in the courts of God better than a thousand spent elsewhere: to value the little time which we have employed with him, more than all the rest of our lives; and to deem the meanest place in his service preferable to the highest preferments in the tents, or even in the palaces, of the ungodly. If we do not choose in this manner, we are carnally-minded, and "to be carnally-minded is death." But what can all the honours, riches, and distinctions of the world do for us, compared with the blessings of his favour, who is the "sun and the shield" of his people? If he gives us grace here and glory hereafter, he will not withhold any thing truly good from us. He hath not indeed engaged to give riches and temporal dignities; but he hath promised to give grace and glory to every one, who seeks for them in his appointed way; and he delighteth in fulfilling this promise. What is grace, but heaven begun below, in the knowledge, love, and service of God? What is glory, but the completion of this felicity, in perfect conformity to him, and the full enjoyment of him for ever? And if he hath begun to give us grace, his grace will be sufficient for us, and will certainly ripen into glory. Let us then seek this true happiness; and desire to be fruitful, through the benign influences of the Sun of righteousness, as well as safe and cheerful under the protection of "the shield of salvation." Let us study to walk uprightly in his ways, and to trust in his mercies; let us thankfully receive what he gives, and be well satisfied to be without what he withholds, or takes away; for we may be sure that he sees it evil for us; and let us hold it fast, as an indisputable principle, notwithstanding all possible tribulation, that "the man is happy, who trusteth in the LORD of hosts, the God of Jacob."

PSALM LXXXV. V. 1.—3. This psalm seems to have been written, either during the Babylonish captivity, or before the people were re-established in their own land.—‘It might be much better used by them,’ (the Jews,) ‘after their return from the captivity of Babylon, than at any other time; when they were infested with many enemies, who disturbed the peaceable enjoyment of their country and religion.’ (Bp. Patrick.) (Notes, Era iv.—vi.)—The Lord had formerly been favourable unto their fathers, and had often brought back their captivity, having pardoned those sins for which they had been sold into the hands of their enemies; and this gave the captive Jews encouragement again to expect deliverance. (Marg. Ref.) Or, ‘We have received the beginnings of deliverance, as a token of thy forgiveness and reconciliation; therefore “perfect what concerneth us.”’ (Note, cxlviii. 8.)

V. 4. 'Our sins indeed deserve worse than all our sufferings, and retard our re-establishment; but turn and convert us to thyself by thy special grace, and make way for the more complete effects of thy reconciliation to us.' (Notes, lxxx. 3. 19. Jer. xxxi. 18-20. Dun. ix. 14-20.)

V. 5—7. (Notes, lxxiv. 1, 2. lxxvii. 5—12. Marg. Ref.) 'He confesseth that our salvation cometh only of God's mercy.' (Notes, Ezra iii. 8—13. Jer. xxxiii. 11.)

V. 8. The prophet having prayed for mercy and salvation, waited to hear what message "God the Lord" would send by him; being assured that he had thoughts of peace towards the nation of Israel, whom he had taken for his people, and specially favoured, and that a peace-maker would at length be sent to them. But as folly, or idolatry or wickedness, had brought on them their former miseries, he warned them to beware, when again favoured and prospered, not to return to the same foolish and rebellious conduct; or, predicted that they would not.—After the captivity, the nation was preserved from gross idolatry till the Redeemer came; and he both went himself and sent his apostles and ministers, to speak peace to Israel first, and to "bless them by turning every one of them from his iniquities." (Note, Acts iii. 22–26.) But the nation rejected him and his message, and, returning to rebellion and folly, was deprived of its peculiar privileges; and then peace was spoken in Christ's name to the Gentiles, who became the people and "saints" of God by faith in Christ Jesus, and returned no more to their dumb idols and evil courses. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 9. The temple and ordinances of God had been "the glory" of Israel: and that glory in some measure dwelt among them again after the captivity. But the Redeemer, who appeared in that land, was its chief glory; his coming approached, and his salvation was, at all times, nigh those who feared the Lord.—Christ himself, "the salvation of God," and the glory of his people Israel, was evidently predicted; and the expectation of this great deliverer was intended to be the support of true believers under their trials, through successive ages; even as the expectation of his coming to make his cause triumphant, and at length to raise the dead, and judge the world, is, under the new-testament dispensation. (Notes, 1 Cor. iv. 2—5. Tit. ii. 11—14. Heb. ix. 27. 28.)

V. 10—13. When God restored the captive Jews, he mercifully fulfilled his faithful promises to them. He had glorified his justice in their sufferings, and he might consistently return unto them in peace. Thus whilst truth was performed on earth, righteousness looked down from heaven with approbation. The Lord conferred manifold benefits on his people : their land again gave its increase, both of the fruits of the earth, and of the fruits of righteousness ; for the justice and holiness of God, which had been so conspicuous in those dispensations, had a powerful effect to attach the people to his ordinances, and commandments, and to teach them to copy the example of his equity, truth, and mercy. Thus this passage may be explained ; but the interpretation is comparatively uninteresting, and falls below the energy of the expressions made use of.—It is therefore generally, and justly no doubt, interpreted in a far higher and fuller sense, of the harmony of the Divine attributes in the redemption of sinners by Jesus Christ. The truth of the promises is manifested by the mercy of God in sending the Redeemer ; and the truth of the types and prophecies, in his person, miracles, obedience, and atonement : ( Note, John xiv. 4—6 : ) but especially the truth of the threatenings now consists with the exercise of mercy to believers, through the great surety, “who bare their sins in his own body on the tree." (Notes, Is. liii. 4—12. Dan. ix. 24: 1 Pet. ii. 18—25. 1 John ii. 1, 2.) The justice of God, which renders to all their due, demanded the punishment of the transgressor, and seemed to preclude all hope of his obtaining favour; but it is now satisfied by the great atonement, and amicably embraces and unites with peace; and entirely approves of the believing sinner's being treated as a righteous person by a reconciled Judge. (Notes, Is. ix. 6, 7. xlv. 23—25. 2 Cor. v. 18—21. Eph. ii. 11—18. Heb. vii. 1—3.) Thus Christ, the TRUTH and LIFE, sprang out of the earth, when he was born of a woman; and "justice" looked down upon his character, obedience, and atonement, well pleased and satisfied. (Notes, Mal. iii. 16, 17. xvii. 5—8. John xiv. 4—6.) For his sake the Father giveth all good things, especially his Holy Spirit, to those who ask him; (Notes, Matt. vii. 7—11. Luke xi. 6—13; and by his influence, every land, where the gospel is preached, produces an increase of believers and of holiness to the glory of God. "Righteousness," as a harbinger, marched before, and marked out the Redeemer's path, which he pursued without deviation through his whole course; his righteousness went before, to prepare his mediatorial throne: and when it is discovered to the believer for his justification, by the teaching of the Holy Spirit, it becomes also his example, and he learns to walk in the steps of Christ, as well as to rely on his merits. This harmony of the Divine attributes in man's salvation, is the grand peculiarity of the Christian religion, by which it displays the glory of God in full perfection. No other religion, no other view of Christianity, but that for substance here stated, makes any provision for the honour of the Divine justice in the exercise of mercy; and this accords to the language of the prophets and apostles in many places. (Notes, Is. xlv. 20—22. Jer. xxiii. 5, 6. Rom. iii. 21—26.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The mercies shewn to Israel, in their deliverance from bondage and captivity, were external signs of that redemption afforded, in all ages, to the remnant of believers, in setting them free from the bondage of sin and Satan, which always accompanies the "covering of their sins," and the turning away of the fierce wrath of God from them.—The awakened sinner, when distressed in conscience, should attend to this report, and cry earnestly to "the God of salvation," to convert him by his grace, and mercifully to cause his anger to cease from him: nor will that anger endure for ever against any, but the impenitent and unbelieving.—Even the true people of God, when they commit sin, may expect sharp and tedious afflictions: but when they return to him, humbly praying, that he would "shew them his mercy, and grant them his salvation;" he will in due time revive their comforts, and make them again to rejoice in him. (Note, li. 12, 13.)—Having spoken unto the Lord in prayer, we should compose ourselves to hear him speak to us by his word; and to expect an answer by his Spirit, or in his providence. He will certainly "speak peace to his people," whom he hath separated and sanctified to himself. Yet let them take warning that they do not turn again to folly, forgetful of his rebukes and corrections, and abusing his mercy: for this conduct so much resembles that of hypocrites, that it must bring them into uncertainty and distress; and the Lord will greatly resent it, if their falls do not teach them watchfulness, and their recoveries gratitude.—The preaching of the gospel and the lively ordinances of God, confer more honour on any land, city, or village, than all external distinctions can do: and "his salvation is nigh those who fear" his wrath, reverence his authority, and humbly seek his mercy. For in the Redeemer's person and work, all things are ready for the reception of every one, whose heart is prepared to accept of mercy; all the persons and perfections in the Godhead will be eternally glorified in the salvation of sinners: and the redemption of their souls, when they repent and believe the gospel, is a continuation of the display, which was made of the Divine truth, justice, and mercy, when the Redeemer paid the all-sufficient ransom. Through him the sinner asks and receives "all things pertaining to life and godliness," and thus becomes fruitful in every good work: and, by looking unto the Saviour's righteousness, he finds his feet "set in the way of his steps."—May this salvation be communicated to our hearts, and appear in our lives; that as the Divine attributes harmonize in our redemption, so all Christian graces may harmonize in our characters. (Note, 2 Pet. i. 5—7.) May this glory dwell in our land, and yield a large increase of truth and goodness, of purity and equity, through successive generations. May the Lord revive his church

PSALM LXXXVI.

David pleads his need, and the fervour of his devotion, in imploring help from the God of grace and mercy, 1-7. He praises God, as alone worthy of universal adoration; and prophesies that all nations shall thus adore him, 8-10. He prays for teaching and grace, renders thanks for former mercies, complains of his haughty foes, and craves some special token of divine favour, 11-17.

NOTES.

PSALM LXXXVI. Title. It is not certain, whether David offered this prayer when persecuted by Saul, or when driven out of the land by Absalom; though the latter seems most probable.

V. 1, 2. (Notes, 17, 18. xxxiv. 2-6. Matt. v. 3. Marg. Ref.) Holy. (2.) 'One whom thou favourest, (Marg.) hast set apart for thyself; and 'made partaker of sanctifying grace: 'one who has found favour and learned mercy. It is the same word which in the sixteenth psalm is translated 'holy one,' and it is generally rendered 'a saint.' When St. Paul spoke of himself, as 'less than the least of all saints; he (as David does here) united the deepest poverty of spirit, with the fullest confidence that he was in a state of grace, and an accepted servant of God. (Note, Eph. iii. 8. Marg. Ref.)

V. 3-5. David prayed not only every day, but all the day, that is, frequently, constantly, and importunately: (Notes, xxv. 4, 5. Luke xviii. 1-8:) and he not only lifted up his voice, but his soul, his most earnest desires, unto God: (Notes, xxv. 1. 1 Sam. i. 12-16:) and therefore he expected that he should be made joyful by an answer to his supplications; because, though conscious of sin, in many instances, yet he firmly believed that God was abundantly kind, propitious, and compassionate to all who thus called on him: (Note, 14, 15. Marg. Ref.)

V. 6-8. (Notes, 1. 7-15. xci. 14-16. cxxx. 1-4. Marg. Ref.)—The Gentiles indeed might call on their gods, and yet perish in their perils and miseries; as the objects of their idolatry had no power to save them: but the God, whom David worshipped, was not like them, but infinitely powerful as well as merciful; and his former works for his people encouraged the expectation of effectual aid to all his upright worshippers. (Notes, Ex. xv. 11. Deut. xxxii. 30. 31. xxxiii. 26. 2 Kings xix. 15-19. Is. xl. 18-20. 25. 26. Jer. x. 16.)

V. 9, 10. It is probable, David hoped, that God's interposition in his behalf, and the celebration of his glory, and wonderful works, by him and his subjects, would bring many of the neighbouring nations to renounce idolatry, and worship the Creator: but 'the Spirit of God which spake by him, and whose words were in his tongue,' evidently predicted the calling of the gentiles by the gospel, and the universal prevalence of Christianity. The original is expressly a prediction; and is generally so translated:—'This proveth that David prayed in the name of the Messias, of whose kingdom he doth here prophesy.' Notes, xxii. 27-31. lxvii. lxviii. 8-11. 17-19. Is. ii. 2-5. xi. 6-9. xliii. 8-13. Jer. x. 6-11. Zech. viii. 20-23. xiv. 6-9. Rev. xi. 15-18. xx. 1-6.)—Alone. (10.) (Notes, Deut. vi. 4, 5. xxxii. 37-39. Is. xlii. 6-8. Rev. i. 8-11.)

V. 11. Unite, &c. Naturally all the powers of our mind are 'out of course.' The judgment is darkened, the will perverted, and the affections, instead of cheerfully following the directions of the higher powers of the soul, tumultuate and rebel against them. The effect of grace is, to correct this disorder; and to subject the passions to the dominion of right reason, by subjecting the whole soul to the authority of God. But its operations are never in this world carried to perfection. Still the mind which loves God, and 'delights in his law after the inner man,' 'finds another law within, warring against the law' which it would fain obey. 'It cannot therefore do the things which it would:—' still the affections are apt to wander after forbidden objects; and too often the consent of the will is, for the time, drawn over to that which it habitually rejects. (Notes, Rom. vii. 15-25. Gal. v. 16-18.) The harmony of holiness is broken, or not yet perfectly restored: 'the flesh lusteth against the spirit,' and is contrary to it. Thus the heart is divided, and an inward strife maintained, to the deep affliction of the believer, who is prepared oftentimes to cry, 'O wretched man that I am!' and at all times to pray, 'Unite my heart,' so liable to distraction, so prone to division between God and the world, 'to fear thy name.' (Notes, Matt. vi. 24. 2 Cor. i. 12-14. xi. 1-6.)

V. 12, 13. (Marg. Ref.) Many confine the meaning of these words to the imminent danger of death, from which God had delivered his servant. But perhaps David referred to the guilt of murder and adultery, which he had contracted, and which merited the severest vengeance, temporal and eternal; yet the Lord of his great mercy had pardoned those, as well as all his other sins, and had thus 'delivered his soul from the lowest hell.'—It is the same word that is used concerning Christ, and translated hell. It means the invisible state, whether of the body in the grave, or of the soul in the world of spirits; but the word 'lowest' greatly favours the latter interpretation. Some think that David here also spake as the type of Christ; which was certainly the case in the sixteenth psalm. (Note, xvi. 8-11.)

V. 14, 15. Many a time God had rescued his servant from the most extreme danger; but again he stood in urgent need of the same powerful aid. Absalom, Ahithophel, and the other conspirators, being proud, violent, cruel, and impious men, sought to murder him; and perhaps were encouraged to hope for success by an idea, that David's crimes had provoked God to forsake him. (Notes, iii. 1, 2. lxxi. 10, 11.) And, indeed, David seems here to allow, that this would have been the case, had the Lord dealt with him in rigorous justice: but the abundant mercy of God to the most guilty and miserable, and his faithfulness to his promises, gave the humble penitent a firm ground of confidence, that he was pardoned, and should be delivered from such haughty and impious assailants. (Marg. Ref. Notes, Ex. xxxiv. 5-7. Mic. vii. 18-20. John i. 17.)

V. 16. (Note, cxliii. 10-12.) The son, &c. David seems here to plead, that his pious mother had brought him up in the fear of God, and offered many prayers for him; and therefore he was devoted to him from his birth, and entrusted to his keeping, having been brought up as a servant in his family; as the children of the female slaves were brought up in their master's family, were considered as his property, and were entitled to his protection. (Notes, li. 5, 6. cxvi. 16. 2 Tim. i. 3-5.)—The Lord Jesus was the son of her who said, 'Behold the handmaid of the Lord, be it unto me according to thy word.' (Luke i. 38.)

V. 17. David seems to have hoped, that, if God would shew some evident token of favour, and so evidently interpose that all might see his determination to help and comfort his servant, even his virulent enemies might be put to shame, and brought to repentance, and so share the plenteous mercy of God.—The resurrection of Christ and the descent of the Holy Spirit were 'tokens for good' to the church; which put all those, who had crucified the Lord of glory, to shame and confusion, and many of them were likewise brought to repent and believe the gospel.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The condescension of our God, in bowing down his ear to receive the prayers of us wretched sinners, is very wonderful: yet our very poverty and wretchedness, when felt and acknowledged, form a powerful plea at the throne of grace.—It is a great encouragement in prayer, to be conscious that we have experienced the converting grace of God, and have learned to trust in him, and to

PSALM LXXXVII. V. 1 Some think that this psalm was composed to be sung, when the foundation of the temple on mount Moriah was laid ; or when David fixed on the spot where the temple was to be erected. (Notes, Gen. xlii. 2. 1 Chr. xxi. 26—30. xxii. 1. 2 Chr. iii. 1.)—Mount Moriah seems to have been a part of mount Zion.—“It is his,” (or, God’s) “foundation in the mountains of holiness.” Or, “Its foundation,” &c. (the temple’s.) The abruptness of the beginning shows how full the psalmist’s mind was of joy and admiration. The tabernacle placed, and the temple afterwards built, by express divine direction on these holy mountains, were typical of Christ, as the foundation, and his church, as “built on this foundation, for an habitation of God through the Spirit.” (Notes. Is. lxviii. 16. 1 Cor. iii. 10—15. Eph. ii. 19—22.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

We ought to build all our hopes on that foundation, on which God hath built his church, and his whole plan of manifesting the glory of all his perfections in complete harmony : and “ other foundation can no man lay, than that is laid, which is Jesus Christ.” They, who build on this holy foundation, thence derive sanctifying grace, and become a holy temple and priesthood, offering spiritual sacrifices acceptable to God through him. (Note, 1 Pet. ii. 4—6.)—Public worship, properly conducted, is most honourable, and therefore most acceptable to the Lord ; and ought not by any means to be neglected by those, who would be accounted denizens of the city of our God. When we consider the glorious things, which are spoken of her pleasant situation, her holy temple, her royal palaces, her fortifications ; her righteous King, and his wise, just, and merciful government ; the character of her inhabitants ; and all their privileges, immunities, and durable advantages, we can do no other than desire to be enrolled among her citizens.—After all the encomiums, which have been lavished, on the heroes, statesmen, orators, poets, and philosophers, of which Egypt, China, Greece, and Rome, and all other nations, have boasted; impartiality must allow, that the despised church of God hath produced an illustrious and numerous catalogue of worthies, who have done vastly more to render mankind wise, holy, and happy, than all who have appeared on earth besides: though Emmanuel, the divine Saviour, born of Israel's race, as Zion's most glorious Son, her honour and felicity, infinitely outshines all the rest. Yet, his followers are justly deserving of esteem, applause, and gratitude, above all other men. But no one expects that they will receive due honour, who reflects how the Son of God himself, and his prophets and apostles, were treated, as they severally appeared on earth, and performed their respective services to mankind. But, in the records of heaven the meanest of those, who "are born again," stands registered: "the Lord himself, when he writeth up the people," will allow them all the privileges of citizens of Zion, and honour them before the assembled world: and this honour and happiness alone are worthy of the ardent desires of all men, in every age and every clime. For "the Highest himself shall establish Zion:" a vast and eternal revenue of praise will redound to him, from his church of redeemed sinners, and their joy to eternity shall equal their largest capacities. All the springs of life and consolation are in the church alone: and they, who draw not from these wells of salvation, will most certainly be for ever put off with broken cisterns which can hold no water.

NOTES.

PSALM LXXXVIII. Title. Heman the Ezrahite, so distinguished, according to the general opinion of learned men, as a descendant of Zerach, the son of Judah, was a different person from Heman the chief singer, in the days of David, who was a Levite. (Notes, 1 Kings iv. 30—34. 1 Chr. ii. 6. xxv. 1—6.) But it is not at all certain, at what time, or on what occasion, the psalm was composed.—Some think the word Leannoth signifies, "for dejection," as almost the whole psalm is the emphatic language of the deepest despondency; but others suppose the word to mean no more, than that the psalm was to be sung responsively, and that it is merely a musical term.

V. 1, 2. Probably the psalmist wrote this psalm under great distress of soul, and meant to describe his own case: yet, the language unavoidably leads the thoughts of the attentive reader to the Redeemer, who was doubtless intended by the Holy Spirit; and the history of his closing scene forms the best comment upon it.—It is called by many 'a penitential psalm;' but there is not one confession of sin, or prayer for pardon, contained in it; nor one comfortable word, except the address, "O LORD God of my salvation," which may be applied to Christ with reference to his deliverance from his sufferings and enemies. (Marg. Ref.)—'Though many cry in their sorrows; yet they cry not earnestly to God for remedy; as he' (the psalmist) 'did to him whom he confessed to be the Author of his salvation.'

V. 3. (Notes, xxii. 1—21. lxxx. 1—21. Matt. xxvi. 36—39.) "Full" indeed "of troubles" was thy soul, O blessed Jesus, in that dreadful hour, when, under the weight of our sins and sorrows, thou wert sinking into the grave.—Let us judge of thy love by thy sufferings, and of both by the impossibility of our fully comprehending them.' (Bp. Horne.) (Marg. Ref. Note, Eph. iii. 14—19.)

V. 4. Christ, 'died to all appearance, like the rest of mankind; nay, being forcibly put to death as a malefactor, he seemed in the hands of his executioners, "as a man that had no strength." The people shook their heads at him, saying, "He saved others, himself he cannot save." (Bp. Horne.) (Notes, Matt. xxvii. 39—44. 2 Cor. xiii. 1—4.)

V. 5. A dead man has done with, and is freed from, the concerns of this world. (Note, Job iii. 11—19.) So long as he lived, he was the object of God's providential care; but when he is laid in the grave, he seems forgotten, and cut off from his hand; that is, until the resurrection. (Notes, Job xiv. 7—15.)

V. 6—12. The majesty, holiness, wisdom, and power of God, (infinitely excelling all the endowments of the noblest creatures,) demand the reverential fear of all the assembled saints on earth, and of the angels who surround his throne in heaven; and accordingly, all the holy worshippers in heaven stand in awe of him, abhor whatever would offend him, and worship him with the most profound veneration of his manifested glory: and his saints on earth ought, in the same spirit, to wait the event of their difficulties and trials. "God is very formidable in the assembly of his holy ones," &c. (The word

16 <sup>a</sup>In thy name shall they rejoice all the day: and <sup>a</sup>in thy righteousness shall they be exalted.

rendered "to be feared," is translated reverend, cxi. 9.) By his "power" he would certainly manifest his faithfulness; as he ruleth and boundeth the raging ocean, which none else can govern; so would he restrain the progress of those enemies, who seemed about to swallow up his church with irresistible force and fury. (Notes, lxxv. 6, 7. xci. 3, 4. Job xxxviii. 8-11. Matt. viii. 23-27.) He had formerly broken Rahab, (or Egypt,) and delivered his people, and afterwards crushed the nations of Canaan; and with his strong arm he was able to scatter their present enemies: (Note, Is. li. 9-11:) being the creator and proprietor of heaven and earth, and having chosen Israel as his people; he would certainly make the land in all its parts, from north to south, from east to west, (which Tabor and Hermion, two distant mountains, represented,) to rejoice in his name, and resound with his praise.—Strong Lord, (8.) JAH. (Note, lxxiii. 4.)

V. 13, 14. Habitation, or establishment, or basis. JEHOVAH's throne is established in justice and judgment: his almighty power and sovereign authority are always exercised in perfect justice and wisdom, and in entire consistency with his mercy and truth; and these mark out the path in which he walketh with his people. 'Thou dost not rule the world merely by thy absolute power; but hast placed thy principal glory in justice and equity, mercy and fidelity, from which thou never swervest.' (Bp. Patrick.) (Notes, xxv. 10. xlv. 6, 7. lxxv. 10-13. lxxvii. 14, 15. xci. 2. xcix. 4. John i. 17.)

V. 15-18. (Notes, Lev. xxv. 9-15. P. O. Num. x. 2-10.) The sound of the sacred trumpets, calling the people to their solemn feasts, and announcing the year of jubilee, seems here alluded to. If the difference between that typical dispensation and the clear light of Christianity be duly considered; it will be allowed, that they who attentively hear, who understand, believe, and obey the gospel, who experience its efficacy upon their hearts, and bring forth the fruits of it in their lives, are "the people that know the joyful sound." Such persons are happy: they walk in the comfort of God's manifested presence and favour; they rejoice in his name, or perfections, as their security and felicity: they are "made the righteousness of God in Christ," and even the justice of God ensures their exaltation; they glory in him as their strength, and give him the glory of all that they are enabled to do; and his favour will exalt them above all their enemies, as it is their ornament and honour: for they are now the subjects of the Holy One of Israel, their king, and entitled to his omnipotent protection. (Notes, i. 1-3. xxxii. 1, 2. lxxv. 4. Matt. v. 2-12.)

—The old translation renders the eighteenth verse more literally, "For our shield appertaineth to the LORD, and our king to the Holy One of Israel." (Marg.) 'Though the kings of David's race be at present enfeebled, and unable to defend us: yet their cause, as placed over the people of God, and as types of the Messiah, Israel's King, is his cause, and he will not suffer it to be permanently run down. (Note, Is. vii. 2.) The LORD, the Holy One of Israel, will take care of our king, that he may be the shield of his true worshippers.' (Note 2 Chr. xlii. 4-12. Marg. Ref.)

V. 19-37. Samuel may be meant, as "the holy one," or the saint and prophet of God, to whom He spake in vision respecting David, for "holy men of God spake as they were moved by the Holy Ghost." (Notes, 1 Sam. viii. 13-15. xv. 27, 28. xvi. 1, 2. 6-13.) The Lord had made trial of several others to govern his people, but had laid them aside again. After Saul's rejection, he found David, and chose him from among the people, and endued him with courage and might, that he might exalt him to the throne, and lay help upon him for the deliverance and prosperity of Israel: but especially, that he might be a type of Christ, that mighty one, who in human nature is chosen and qualified to fill the mediatorial throne, for the salvation of his people. The Lord by the hands of Samuel anointed David with the holy oil: not only as an emblem of the graces and gifts conferred upon him; but as a type of Christ, the king, priest, and prophet, which the Father provided for us, and anointed with the Holy Spirit without measure. After David had been anointed, he was exposed to severe trials and persecutions, especially from Saul, that "son of wickedness;" but none could obtain any advantage against him, either by policy or power; for the Lord powerfully established and strengthened him, and finally made him victorious over every enemy, and brought terrible plagues on those who hated him. He also established his authority over Israel, and extended his dominion from the Mediterranean sea to the Euphrates: and while David adhered to the worship of the Lord, as "his Father, his God, and the rock of his salvation;" he was treated as his first-born or favourite son, and made more honourable than the kings of the earth. (Marg. Ref. Notes, Col. i. 15-17. Heb. xii. 22-25.)—All this, however, was but a faint shadow of the Redeemer's sufferings, deliverance, and consequent glory and authority, in whom alone all these predictions and promises are fully accomplished. The promises of the covenant to the posterity of David were in some measure performed to Solomon, and to the long succession of kings which reigned over Judah till the captivity; (Notes, 2 Sam. vii.) yet in Christ and in his spiritual seed, they have their complete accomplishment. From the Redeemer and his church, which is one with him, the lovingkindness of the Father will never be utterly removed. God hath pledged the honour of his own holiness, that he will exactly perform the covenant made with Christ, whom David typified. So that the Saviour and his church shall remain, as the sun and moon, to the end of time, and continue, (like the rainbow, "that faithful witness in the heavens," to the truth of God in his covenant with Noah,) a constant witness that God hath fulfilled his covenant with the Redeemer. (Notes, Gen. ix. 9-17. Is. liv. 6-10.) And as the Lord by various corrections visited upon the posterity of David their transgressions of his law; but did not utterly cut them off, continuing them in regal authority over Judah till the captivity, and afterwards preserving the family till Christ descended from it, and received the kingdom: so he will correct his people, but never finally cast them off. (Notes, lxxii. cxxxi. 10-17. 1 Kings ix. 3-9. xl. 9-12. Is. ix. 6, 7. Jer. xxxii. 5, 6. xxxiii. 14-26. Ez. xxxiv. 23-31. xxxvii. 24, 25. Hos. iii. 4, 5. Am. ix. 1, 12. Luke i. 26-33. 67-75. Acts xv. 16-18.)—No doubt the emphatical language used in the covenant of God with his servant David, as it is here brought together and enlarged on, must have excited in believers at that time very high expectations, which Solomon's unprecedented prosperity was calculated to confirm. But it is probable, that most of them, (like the apostles, in respect of the Redeemer's kingdom,) interpreted the promises in a manner different from their real meaning: and so entertained unwarranted hopes of temporal prosperity, under the kings of David's line; without duly considering, what had also been repeatedly declared concerning them, in case they forsook the worship of God; and without properly looking forward to Christ, the Son of David, in whom all the promises were to have their full accomplishment. (Marg. Ref.) When, therefore, they saw a king of David's race deprived of a very large part of his dominions; opposed by Jeroboam; and vanquished, plundered, and put under tribute by Shishak, in a very short time after Solomon's death; and perceived little hope of his emerging from his difficulties; it is not at all wonderful, if they were tempted to conclude, that the promises and covenant of God, (though confirmed with an oath by his own holiness, or all his moral perfections,) had failed, and would come to nothing.—This was the temptation; yet the psalmist evidently 33 "Nevertheless my lovingkindness will I *not utterly take from him, nor suffer my faithfulness to *fail.

34 "My covenant will I not break, *nor alter the thing that is gone out of my lips.

35 "Once have I sworn by my holiness, *that I will not lie unto David.

36 "His seed shall endure for ever, *and his throne as the sun before me.

37 It shall be established for *ever as the moon, and as *a faithful witness in heaven. Selah.

38 "But thou hast cast off *and abhorred, thou hast been *wroth with thine anointed.

40 Thou hast *broken down all his hedges; thou hast *brought his strong holds to ruin.

42 Thou hast *set up the right hand of his adversaries; thou hast made all his enemies to rejoice.

resisted it, strenuously and successfully; and taught his people to do the same. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 38—45. 'Because of the horrible confusion of things, the prophet complaineth unto God, as though he saw not the performance of his promise; and thus discharging his cares on God, he resisteth doubt and impatience.'—'He meaneth the horrible dissipation, and rending of the kingdom under Jeroboam.'—'He sheweth that the kingdom fell before it came to perfection, or was ripe.'—'In joining prayer with his complaints, he sheweth that his faith never failed.'—'When the calamities, above mentioned, (Note 1.) befell Rehoboam, it seemed as if the Lord had been provoked to abhor and cast off his anointed king: the covenant with David appeared to be made void, his crown trampled upon in disgrace, and the Divine protection withdrawn. The Israelites spoiled and reproached the house of David, the Egyptians were victorious and triumphant; and in the early days of that royal race, it was put to shame, and reduced to the brink of ruin: and how could this consist with the faithfulness of God to his covenant? Doubtless the psalmist meant to urge this as a plea with him, to return in mercy, and restore the family of David to prosperity; and likewise to propose it to the distressed prince and people of Judah, for their instruction, that they might consider the dispensation as a chastisement for their sins, and so be led by it to repentance. Probably, he also meant to lead their thoughts to the promised seed of David, whom the covenant principally respected. (Marg. Ref.) 'When the faithful few beheld the true Son of David, delivered over to a shameful, as well as a painful death, they began to think the covenant made void, and the promises at an end. "We trusted," said they, "that it had been he which should have redeemed Israel." (Horne.)—The early corruption of Christianity by "damnable heresies," the lamentable schisms which have rent it, and the oppressive persecutions and multiplied corruptions, to which it hath so long been exposed, have precisely the same effect on Christians in general, in respect of the promises and predictions, concerning an universal propagation and triumph of the gospel, contained in the sacred Scriptures. (Note, Rev. xx. 4—6.)

V. 46—48. (Marg. Ref.) The psalmist here seems to have personated the family of David, or one of the kings of that race, or to have formed the psalm for the use of his afflicted prince. The reigns of David and Solomon were soon over; the glory of their kingdom had been very transient, if it were thus to terminate; and they seemed almost to be made in vain: for the short glimpse of Israel's prosperity was now extinguished; and indeed, as every one must die, if the prosperity of the church depended upon the life of any man, it would soon be buried in his grave. "Wherefore hast thou made in vain all the sons of Adam?" Probably the prophet looked forward to "the second Adam, the Lord from heaven," who indeed saw death, and went down into the grave; (sheol, the unseen state,) yet was able to deliver his life from the power of it; and who rose again, and liveth from age to age, to perpetuate the safety and provide for the happiness of his people. (Note, 1 Cor. xv. 45—49.) With this he might also comfort himself, under the prospect of his own death; though he had survived the external glory of David's kingdom, and expected soon to die, and leave it in disgrace and distress. (Notes, xc. 3—17.)

V. 49. (Notes, 19—37. lxxvii. 5—12. Is. lxiii. 15—19. Marg. Ref.)

V. 50, 51. (Marg. Ref.) 'They laugh at us who wait patiently for the coming of thy Christ.' 'They reproached the footsteps of Christ, or the slowness of his footsteps.'—Other constructions are put on this expression: but they do not seem equally satisfactory. We know, however, that the enemies of the family of David invidiously traced the footsteps of those princes; that is, they examined every part of their conduct, in order to find matter of accusation against them; they overlooked all their eminent services, and aggravated every slip which they made, and even reproached them with such things as they had never done: thus they slandered the anointed of God. (Notes, 1 Kings xii. 4. 16.) Perhaps they also ridiculed the expectations which were formed, of returning prosperity to the family of David, and of the Messiah descending from him.—We remember also, who sought for false witness against Jesus, the anointed of God, to put him to death; and persons of the same stamp will revile those who tread in his steps. (Notes, Matt. xxvi. 57—68. John xv. 17—21.)

V. 52. 'But let them laugh on; neither their scoffs nor our calamity shall hinder us from praising the Lord, and speaking good of him continually, in assured hope that he will at last deliver us. Let it be so, we beseech thee, let it be so, as we desire and hope, that we may ever praise thee for our happy restoration.' (Bp. Patrick.) (Notes, xxxiv. 1—6. xli. 11—13. lxxii. 17—19. cvi. 47, 48. Phil. iv. 6, 7.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—18. When the dispensations of Providence seem contrary to the promises, and we venture to state our difficulties and discouragements before God, we should always recur to first principles, and take it for granted that he is doing right, though we are not able to discern it. (John xiii. P. O. 1—7.)—Faith, in the boundless and everlasting mercy and truth of God, brings comfort into the heart, and fills the mouth with praise, even in the deepest scenes of adversity: and whilst we are assured, that "mercy shall be built up for ever," and "faithfulness established in the heavens;" we should seek and pray that all men, through successive generations, may be acquainted with them, and praise the Lord for them. His covenant with the seed of David, his servant, is immutably ratified; for the throne of David "is builded to all generations," yea, for ever and ever: and all the inhabitants of heaven, as well as the congregations of saints on earth, will continually praise the wonders of his power, displayed in performing the engagements of his word.—We should be careful never to speak or act, as if we thought any of the angels in heaven, or "any of the sons of the mighty" on earth, fit to be compared unto the Lord. He is not limited to such methods as we can conceive, or to such operations as creatures can perform. His thoughts and ways are infinitely above our comprehension; and it is our part to adore the depths which we cannot fathom, and to expect covenanted blessings, when we can see no way in which they can be communicated.—Our "God is greatly to be feared, even in the assembly of his saints, and to be had in reverence of all them that are about him." Nor should our filial confidence in his love abate our awful veneration of his majesty; for then, our worship on earth would bear no resemblance to that of angels in heaven. (Notes, Is. vi. 1—5.) Surely then our external posture, and serious attention, should indicate the reverence of our hearts, when we assemble to worship our glorious God! (Note, Acts xxi. 1—6.) But, alas! how little of this appears in general in our congregations! and how much cause of humiliation have we all on this account!—It is a joyful consideration, that the power, which created and upholds the earth, and which rules the impetuous waves of the sea, is engaged to perform the promises; and that the proprietor of the universe is "the portion" of his people. That high and strong right hand and mighty arm, which smote Egypt, will to the end scatter the enemies of his church; and all who trust in the mercy of God, shall rejoice in his name; for as justice and judgment are the stability of his throne, so mercy and truth direct all his dealings towards his believing servants. Happy then are they, who know, believe, and obey the joyful sound of his gospel! for their present safety and their eternal felicity are secured in the favour of him, whom they trust as a Saviour, love as a Father, and obey as a King.

V. 19—37. The Lord hath spoken to his prophets and apostles, in divers times and various ways, with an especial purpose of making known to sinful men, that he "hath laid help upon one that is mighty, and exalted one chosen his largest promises in their fullest meaning. If, then, we can do little else, during our few remaining days on earth, let us give ourselves unto prayer: let us plead with the Lord his former mercies to his people, and the promises of his word: let us humbly represent before him, the reproach cast upon his servants by his enemies, through the prevalence of impiety in the visible church, and through the apparent delay of his making his truth universally triumphant. ## NOTES.

PSALM XC. Title. "Moses the man of God," (Marg. Ref.) (the prophet Moses, and not one of the same name in after ages, as some have imagined,) may very reasonably be supposed to have composed this most instructive and affecting psalm, when the generation of Israel, which God had by him brought out of Egypt, was sentenced to fall in the wilderness, or when he had witnessed in a great degree the execution of that sentence. (Notes, Num. xiii. xiv.) It is not indeed improbable that it was used at the tabernacle, as well as published among the people, during that solemn season, when death marched his rounds among them in so remarkable a manner. It seems to have been preserved along with the books of Moses, and afterwards to have been inserted in the book of psalms.—To obtain the most interesting view of this picture, so to speak, we must consider Moses as the principal figure; and carefully advert to his peculiar circumstances at that season. The sentiments indeed of the psalm are never unsuitable to our situation in this world: but they would be peculiarly adapted to the case of a pious man, in a time of pestilence, when tens of thousands were swept away on every side of him. (Note, xci. 3—8.)

V. 1, 2. The Israelites were shut up in the desert, and not allowed to find habitations in the promised land: but the psalmist recollected, that even Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob were strangers and pilgrims in Canaan. Indeed, God himself had, in all ages, been the home, rest, safety, and comfort of his people: and into that "dwelling-place" they might enter by faith and prayer, even in the wilderness; (Notes, John vi. 52—58, 1 John iv. 13—17;) seeing he was the same almighty, merciful, and faithful God, even before the world was created, yea, from eternity to eternity. (Notes, ciii. 15—18. Ex. iii. 14. Deut. xxxiii. 27, 28. Is. lvii. 15, 16. Heb. xiii. 8.)

V. 3—6. When man sinned, his Creator sentenced him "to return to the dust from whence he was taken." Adam, however, and several of his descendants, lived almost a thousand years; but in the sight of the eternal God this was but as yesterday; and it was soon past like a watch, or three hours of the night, which glides away while men sleep. (Notes, Gen. iii. 17—19.—v. P. U. 1—20. 2 Pet. iii. 8.) Thus the Lord turned them to destruction, as well as their more short-lived posterity; and the human race had all along been swept away by death as by an impetuous torrent: life appeared but a sleep; and all earthly prosperity only resembled the verdure and variegated hues of the meadow in a summer's morning; which before night was cut down by the scythe, and withered by the sun. (Notes, xxxiv. 5, 6. ciii. 11—15. Is. xl. 6—8. Jam. i. 9—11. iv. 13—17. 1 Pet. i. 24, 25.)—The word translated, "thou carriest them away as with a flood," may be rendered, "thou overflowedst them;" and be considered as a reference to the desolations of the general deluge.

V. 7—10. The Israelites had provoked the Lord, by their unbelief and rebellion, to swear in his wrath that they should not enter Canaan; and this passage may refer to those events. Accordingly they were swept away by the wrath of God, in so extraordinary a manner, that they were kept in constant trouble of mind by the dread of his judgments. (Marg. Ref.) Not only were their open transgressions awfully punished; but their secret sins, or the iniquities of their youth, (as some render the word,) were called to remembrance by their righteous Judge. Thus their days and years were turned away from hope and comfort by the wrath of God; spent to little purpose; and soon came to an end, as a tale, a meditation, a waking dream. (Notes, Num. xxvi. 62—65.) Perhaps the lives of men in general were at this era reduced to about the present limits: for after the death of Moses, and Joshua, few instances of a much longer life occur in the Scripture. At least it was thus with that generation of out of the people;" who, being infinite in power and love, as the eternal Son of God, and having become one of us by assuming our nature, "is not ashamed to call us brethren." This is the Redeemer, whom JEHOVAH himself hath appointed for us, and who alone is adequate to the arduous work of our salvation. Having been anointed immeasurably with the Holy Spirit, and strengthened by the power of God, he, in our nature, withstood and repelled the combined assaults of earth and hell; and "is now exalted by the right hand" of the Father "to be a Prince and Saviour, to give repentance, and forgiveness of sins," and to beat down and destroy all that bate his disciples. In the name of JEHOVAH his horn is exalted, and mercy and truth come, through and by him, to the ruined sons of men; and his kingdom shall extend throughout the whole earth. He, in a peculiar sense, could cry unto the Lord, "Thou art my Father, my God, and my strong salvation:" being indeed his first-begotten, his only begotten Son, and made, even in our nature, far higher than the kings of the earth. With him the everlasting covenant is ratified for evermore, and through him alone is mercy exercised towards the guilty. "His dominion shall be for ever, and his throne as the days of heaven." Whilst he invites sinners to incline their ear and come to him, that he may make with them this everlasting covenant; (Note, Is. lv. 1—3:) he treats all his willing subjects as his friends and children: the oath, with which that covenant is ratified to him, as the son of Abraham, and the son of David, is recorded, in order "that we might have a strong consolation who have fled for refuge to lay hold upon the hope set before us;" and the name of God would be dishonoured, if this security could possibly fail, or the thing be once altered which he hath spoken. (Notes, Heb. vi. 15—18.) So that the whole church of Christ, as his spiritual seed, is secured in its immunities and privileges, by the covenant made and ratified with its glorious head. Let us then seek an interest in these blessings; and an assurance that we belong to this happy company, by the witness of the Holy Spirit in our hearts, as the counterpart of "the faithful record in heaven," of our names written in the book of life; that so we may habitually "rejoice in hope of the glory of God."

V. 38—52. Notwithstanding the security of the covenant of grace, it is also very plainly foretold, that damnable heresies, and grievous scandals and corruptions, would take place among professed Christians; and when these predictions, are compared with what we read and witness, they may serve to confirm our faith, though they grieve our hearts.—Indeed, even true Christians offend in many things. Hence it is, that corrections become necessary, in order to the performance of the covenant to the honour of God. When this is the case, the Lord "will visit their transgression with the rod, and their iniquities with scourges: nevertheless, he will not utterly take away his lovingkindness from them, nor suffer his truth to fail." The records, of the Lord's dealings with the family of David, hold before us an emblem of his dealings with his church, and with believers. Grievous may be the afflictions which they endure; great the disgrace and distress of soul which come upon them: but the gates of hell shall not prevail against the church, neither will God finally forsake or abhor the true believer. We should then rejoice in this security; but we should "rejoice with trembling;" many self-deceivers pervert the doctrine; and even they who are interested in the blessing may, notwithstanding, by their misconduct, bring themselves into such darkness and distress as can scarcely be conceived. We ought, therefore, to rely on it for our encouragement in the path of duty, and in bearing the cross; and not when yielding to sloth and self-indulgence. Neither should we give way to despondency, whilst we witness the success of idolatry, superstition, heresy, or infidelity, against the religion of Christ. These early began to corrupt or to oppose the church: and their success seems often to make void the covenant, and profane the Redeemer's crown, to break down the strong holds of his royal city, and to expose his religion to reproach. But though his cause may appear to suffer loss, and his glory to be eclipsed, and his enemies to conquer and triumph; yet this will be only for a time. The Lord will not hide himself for ever, nor suffer "his wrath to burn like fire;" whatever his people fear, or his enemies expect. But when his purposes are effected, he will return, cause his servants to rejoice, and put his enemies to silence and shame. For the Saviour ever liveth to effect his grand designs, and a thousand years are in his sight but as one day: and, though one instrument after another die, and effect very little; though we are all shortly to drop into the grave, and may perhaps leave the church under a thick cloud; and though all the sons of Adam seem made in vain: yet the Lord himself will surely arise and plead his own cause, and fulfil

Israel; very few of whom would exceed, and most would come short of, eighty years.—The verses however are equally applicable to the general state of human nature. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 11. This verse is thus rendered by several learned men: "Who knoweth the power of thy anger, or of thy wrath, according as thou art terrible?" That is, "Who is there, that fears the wrath of the Almighty, in proportion to the degree in which it ought, in all reason, to be dreaded? or in proportion to his fear of mortal men, when possessed of power? Who does not fear the wrath of powerful men too much, and the wrath of almighty God too little? when, in fact, the latter cannot be feared according to its terribleness. Who is sufficiently afraid of offending God; or earnest in seeking to be reconciled to him?" (Notes, Matt. x. 27, 28. Heb. x. 28-31. close. (Marg. Ref.)—According as men do more or less tremble at thy judgments; so dost thou more or less execute them." (Bp. Hall.)

V. 12. The shortness, uncertainty, and sorrows, of life, as the effects of the powerful wrath of God against the sins of men; when considered in connection with the doctrine of the eternal state of future retribution, and that of salvation by the mercy and grace of God, through the promised Redeemer, if duly laid to heart, are suited to teach men true wisdom; and Moses prayed that he and all his people might be taught by the Lord himself thus to lay them to heart. (Notes, xxxix. 4. Deut. xxxii. 29. Job xxviii. 28.)

V. 13-17. The Israelites, notwithstanding their transgressions, were externally the Lord's people, and he had many faithful servants among them. These no doubt thought the time very long, during which they continued under the severe rebukes of God, without the accustomed tokens of his favour. They therefore prayed, along with Moses, that, for their sakes, he would at length change his conduct towards the nation: (Notes, Gen. vi. 6. Deut. xxxii. 36.) and though the sentence respecting Canaan was irreversible, that he would yet without delay satisfy their souls with the comforts of his mercy and grace; which would enable them to spend their few remaining days in holy joy, and counterbalance their long-continued afflictions. They further besought the Lord that he would cause them again to witness his works of power and mercy in behalf of the nation, as an earnest of those more glorious displays, which were to be afforded to their children; and that "the beauty of the Lord their God might be upon them." This implies a request, that he would appear to them in his tabernacle, "the beautiful sanctuary;" that he would continue his ordinances among them, which were their glory and beauty; but especially, that he would shine upon them with the beams of his holiness, (which is his beauty; that, like the moon irradiated and beautified by the reflected beams of the sun, they might be made to shine in the beauty of holiness as derived from him. (Notes, l. 1, 2. cxlix. 4. P. O. 2 Cor. iii. 17, 18.) Thus Moses, Aaron, and others, especially desired that the Lord would prosper and establish their work; that their pious and zealous endeavours might have their full effect, by rendering the Israelites a holy and a happy people; which would best prepare them for the conquest of Canaan, and for the blessings which God had engaged to bestow on the nation.—"Except thou guide with thy Holy Spirit, our enterprises can have no good success." (Marg. Ref.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The favour and protection of God are the only suitable rest and comfort of the soul, in this evil world: and in Christ Jesus he is become the refuge and dwelling-place, to which we may repair, whenever pursued by the accusations of conscience, or the unkindness of men; when wearied with the cares and toils of life; or disquieted by sickness and the prospect of death. (Note, Prov. xviii. 10, 11.) His truth, love, and power are eternal and immutable; and this habitation can never fail those who, from age to age, resort to it for rest and peace. Compared with him, who "from everlasting to everlasting is God" alone, how do the most renowned of the human race shrink into insignificance! The longest life, which men have passed on earth, has been but as "a watch in the night;" and then the word of the Almighty has remanded their bodies to their original dust. What images in nature can then sufficiently illustrate the brevity of our present span of life? the impetuous current of time hurries mortals, as in a sleep, into eternity, where most of them first awake, and lift up their eyes: and all the external splendour and gaiety, which excite the envy, the desires, or the admiration of the thoughtless beholder, are destroyed and withered as in a moment. (Note, Luke xvi. 22, 23.) So that the supposed pleasure of a worldly life passes as a "tale that is told," and generally, taken altogether, it proves a doleful tale. Few in comparison reach the seventy years assigned as the date of man's present life; and if a small number linger out a longer space, their lives are but a continuation of labour and sorrow, and soon they are "cut off and fly away."—But wherefore hath the Lord, as it were, made all men thus in vain? (Note, lxxxix. 46-48.) To this enquiry the scriptural, and the only rational answer, is, that we are a company of condemned criminals, and are thus troubled and consumed by his anger; he has his eye upon our most secret sins, as well as our more open iniquities, the past, as well as the present: and therefore we pass our days away in his deserved wrath. The sentence of temporal death is gone forth, and is irreversible, however the time and circumstances of it may vary. This indeed is very little, compared with the wrath to come; yet, alas! how few seem to understand, or regard, the powerful wrath of that God, who is able to destroy body and soul in hell; though no apprehensions can possibly equal the terror of it! Instead then of wasting our precious fleeting days in pursuing the phantoms of the world, which elude our grasp, and will leave their possessors for ever poor; we should employ ourselves in seeking forgiveness of sins, and an inheritance in heaven. Let us earnestly pray, that the Lord would so teach us to consider the shortness and uncertainty of life, and the proportion of it which is already past, perhaps thirty, forty, fifty, sixty, or more of our threescore years and ten; that we may apply our hearts to this true wisdom. A proper attention to this "one thing needful" will prove us wise to eternity, whatever else be renounced or neglected: but inattention to it will stigmatize us as fools for ever, though we should gain the whole world. (Note, Luke xii. 15-21.) If this grand interest be safe, the shortness of life may rather be matter of mutual congratulation than condolence: and as to the evils that we feel or witness, persevering prayer will prevail either for a mitigation of them, or comfort under them. Whatever else be withheld, the mercy and favour of our God will satisfy our souls: and in communion with him we may "rejoice and be glad all our days," even in this miserable world. "These are the days wherein God afflicteth us, these the years in which we see evil: but he will make us glad according to them."—"These light afflictions, which are but for a moment, work for us a far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory." Then shall our joy be increased, and receive an additional relish from the remembrance of our former sorrows; then shall we bless the days and years, which exercised our faith, and perfected our patience: and then shall we bless God, who chastised us for a season, that he might save us for ever." (Bp. Horne.)—In the mean while, we should lay ourselves out to do what good we can in this evil world, and especially to such as are likely to survive us; earnestly and constantly praying, that the work of redeeming love may be more and more made known, in its glory and efficacy, to our souls, that we may more fully experience the sanctification and consolation of the Holy Spirit; that the beauty of holiness, even the divine image, may be evidently visible in all our character and conduct; that the same blessings, in still larger proportion, may be extended to our children and more remote posterity; that the Lord would "establish the works of our hands upon us," especially if employed in the sacred ministry, or other important services; and that he would illuminate his church with the light and beauty of his truth and purity, and establish the Redeemer's kingdom and work throughout the whole earth.

NOTES.

PSALM XCI. V. 1, 2. It is probable that David wrote this psalm, though his name is not prefixed to it. "The secret place of the Most High," may be an allusion to the ark of the covenant, fixed in the most holy place, as in a secret pavilion. (Notes, xxvii. 4-6. xxxi. 19, 20.)—By faith and prayer, believers put themselves under the protection of God, relying on his power, wisdom, truth, and love; and thus they dwell in an invisible fortress, and are secured by an almighty friend, in a way kept secret from the unbelieving world around them. Whilst the psalmist recommended this refuge and rest to others, he avows his purpose to avail himself of it, and to place his entire confidence in the Lord. (Notes, lxxxix. 14-16. lxxxiv. 11, 12. xc. 1, 2. Gen. xvi. 1. xvii. 1-3. 2 Sam. xxii. 2, 3. Prov. xviii. 10, 11.)—The two verses, however, may be thus rendered, "He that dwelleth in the secret place of the Most High, shall lodge under the shadow of the Almighty; saying of the LORD, My refuge," &c. In every dark season of affliction and danger, he shall have security and comfort, while with his heart he relies on the Almighty, and with his lips avows that his expectation is from him alone. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 3-8. Under a variety of expressions, in the most beautiful style of Eastern poetry, the psalmist represents the manifold dangers to which believers are exposed, from the wickedness of men, and from pestilences and diseases, in all their multiplied forms; and their protection under the power of the Almighty. 39. Marg. Ref.) Yet these are but a shadow of the perils, by which their souls are threatened from the subtlety and power of Satan, the plausible delusions of false teachers, the terrors of persecutors, the allurements of flattery and prosperity, the infectious wickedness of the world, and the deceitfulness of their own hearts. 'But God's help is ever ready for us, whether Satan assail us secretly, or openly; that is his faithful keeping of his promise.'—The Septuagint renders the clause, "the destruction that wasteth at noon-day," "the noon-day demon." 'Avarice and ambition are abroad in the day; while concupiscence as a pestilence walketh in darkness. In adversity the soul is disturbed by terrors, in prosperity still more endangered by pleasures. But Jesus Christ hath overcome the world, to prevent us from being overcome by it.' (Horne.) (Note, John xvi. 31-33.) Yet, as thousands and tens of thousands fall, during a fatal pestilence, while others witnessing the desolations are preserved; so, immense multitudes are swept into destruction by delusions and temptation, while a few escape to mourn over them. 'The godly have some experience of God's judgments against the wicked even in this life; but fully shall they see it at that day when all things shall be revealed.' (Notes, xcii. Matt. xxv. 31-46. Rom. ii. 4-6. 2 Thes. i. 5-10. Rev. xx. 11-15.)

V. 9, 10. These verses are thus rendered in the old version. "For thou hast said, the LORD is mine hope, thou hast set the most High for thy refuge. There shall no evil," &c. Because this is thy avowed and real confidence, therefore thou art safe, and happy. (Notes, cxxi. 5-8. cxxv. 1.)

V. 11, 12. The Lord is pleased to employ the ministration of his holy angels, for the protection of his people from outward harm, while in the path of duty; but if they desert their post and path, they are not warranted to depend on that protection: and not angels, but the Holy Spirit must inwardly guide them in his ways, or bring them back when they wander. (Notes, Gen. xxiv. 5-9. Heb. i. 13, 14.) The mutilated and sophistical quotation which Satan made of this text, in tempting our Saviour, may shew that Christ was principally, though not exclusively, meant. (Note, Matt. iv. 5-7.)

V. 13. By these figurative expressions, Satan and his progeny of wicked men are figuratively described, who persecute the people of God, or attempt to terrify, or seduce, them from their duty, but over whom they shall at length triumph as their Captain hath triumphed. (Marg. Ref. Notes, Gen. iii. 14, 15. Mark xvi. 17, 18. Luke x. 17-20. Rom. viii. 32-39. xvi. 17-20. Rev. xii. 7-12. xx. 1-3.)

V. 14-16. 'To assure the faithful of God's protection, he bringeth in God himself to confirm the same.' So that יהוה himself is here introduced as the speaker; and the persons intended are characterized. They have known the name of the Lord, and set their love on him, expecting their happiness from him, and seeking help from him in prayer: persons of this character he will deliver, honour, exalt, and satisfy with long life; if not here, yet in heaven, where he will shew them his complete salvation. (Notes, ix. 7-12. xxi. 1-7. xxxiv. 15-20. 1 Chr. xxviii. 9. Luke ii. 25-32. John xvii. 1-3. Rom. viii. 28-31. 2 Tim. i. 11, 12. Marg. Ref.)—Even the promises of Scripture imply that "in this world" the best Christians "must have tribulation;" by engaging that the Lord will afford them his gracious presence under their troubles and trials.

The following view of this beautiful psalm, with an interchange of speakers, which has been transmitted to me, seems worthy of consideration. 'Imagine the psalmist to have been addressing himself to some person hopefully disposed towards religion, in sentiments and language of which the first verse affords a specimen: this person being much affected and confirmed in his religious purpose by the discourse, comes to the resolution of the second verse, I will say, &c. Encouraged and excited by this success, the psalmist resumes the conversation, and in yet more animated strains sets forth the security and blessedness of the man "whose hope the LORD is:" "Surely," (if you do so,) "he will deliver," &c. The Almighty himself, at the fourteenth verse, assumes the part of the speaker, and confirms all that his servant had urged, and thus the psalm concludes.'

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The divine protection and consolation, which believers enjoy, are deemed visionary by ungodly men; but they really do abide and repose under "the shadow of the Almighty," which the scorching sun of tribulation cannot penetrate, and in a fortress which no power of the enemy can force. (Notes, Is. xxxii. 1, 2. xxxiii. 15, 16. Matt. xxiii. 37-39.) Let then sinners come to him upon his mercy-seat, through the Redeemer's name: and let those who have experienced his salvation, boldly avow their confidence in him, and encourage others also to trust in him.—Every man must perceive, that in this world we are exposed to innumerable evils and perils, from which no prudence, courage, or strength of our own can secure us; and it must be allowed desirable in the highest degree, to have an almighty, omnipresent, and omniscient protector, who is likewise infinite in goodness, mercy, and truth: one, that can preserve our lives from famine, pestilence, and sudden death; from the desolations of war, the open assaults of robbers and murderers; from the dark designs of false accusers and perjurers; and from innumerable evils, to which we are exposed by day and by night. But they, who violate the commands and neglect the salvation of the Lord, cannot possibly have any well-grounded confidence in his protection: and should he bear with their provocations, and continue their lives for many years; yet, except they repent, they must at length perish in their sins. He, therefore, who is aware of his real situation, discovers far more formidable evils to which he is exposed, than those which have been mentioned. He wants a refuge from the deserved wrath of God, and from the miseries of the eternal world. He needs an effectual and permanent deliverance from Satan, who takes men captive at his will, as the fowler ensnares the unsuspecting bird, (Note, 2 Tim. ii. 23-26;) who appears as a roaring lion, when he excites persecution against the church, or as a subtle serpent and a destructive dragon, when he opposes the faith with seducing lies, vain reasonings, fascinating flatteries, or proffered secular advantages; or when he transforms himself into an angel of light, to deceive men with false religion. (Note, 2 Cor. xi. 1-6. 13-15. Rev. xii. 7-12.) He wants also a protection against the pestilence of a wicked world; that he may not be infected with fashionable or epidemical vices, which form "a destruction that wasteth at the noon-day;" or by any other more silent and unsuspected contagion of example, influence, or false principles, which constitute "a pestilence that walketh in darkness;" nay, he is sensible, that the remainders of corrupt nature often render solitude as dangerous, as the world itself can be. He also longs to be delivered from the terror of these evils, and to be assured that he shall not at last perish with the multitudes, that are on every side thronging the road to destruction. This security and assurance the Christian seeks as his principal object; being persuaded, that if his eternal interests be safe, the Lord will manage all his inferior and temporal concerns wisely and well; and preserve his life on earth as long as is good for him, to whatever perils it may seem exposed. For his encouragement in this grand concern, he by faith daily looks unto Jesus: he contemplates the beloved Son of God, boldly and patiently marching forward on his perilous and rugged path; entirely preserved from the combined hosts of foes which beset his road, and made completely victorious over them; in no degree entangled by any of Satan's snares, wounded by any of his fiery darts, or terrified by his furious assaults; and not in the least infected by the pestilence of sin, the contagious love of the world, or the fear of man. He considers the Redeemer upheld by the arm of the Lord, ministered unto by angels, trampling upon the head of Satan, overcoming the world, and triumphing over the king of terrors. He hears the Father say of him, "Because he hath set his love upon me, therefore will I deliver him: I will set him on high, because he hath known my name," &c.: and, whilst he recollects that the Redeemer's conflicts, sufferings, and exaltation, were all intended for the benefit of his true disciples; he finds himself animated with a holy courage, to deny himself, and take up his cross, and follow him. Relying on the truth and mercy of God, through the Saviour's great atonement, he hath come to "put his trust under the shadow of his wings;" and to shelter his soul under his word, as his "shield and buckler:" he now knows the name of the Lord, and has seen some beams of his glory: he hath set his affections on things above, and given his heart unto the Lord, and desires to love him more and more: he now lives by faith, and daily calls upon the Lord for all he wants. Dangers, temptations, fears, and troubles make him more to prize his refuge and rest. In many a sharp conflict he comes off victorious; many a danger he but just seems to escape; thousands go on in sin, or fall away from their profession; yet, by a sort of miracle, he finds himself preserved: no real evil comes upon him, nor is any plague allowed to come nigh his dwelling-place. Often he experiences extraordinary protection in providence: and he has the comfort to know, that all the angels in heaven are "ministering spirits to the heirs of salvation." His chief fear is, lest he should be drawn aside from the path of duty; but he prays to be led and upheld in it, and to be restored with rebukes and corrections if he wander. At length the conflict ends, and he is crowned conqueror, and has done for ever with trouble,

PSALM XCII.

B.C. 540.

The psalmist shows that it is good to be thankful, to praise God, and to celebrate his perfections and works, 1-5. He contrasts the judgments of God on the wicked, with the abiding felicity of the righteous, 6-15.

NOTES.

PSALM XCII. Title. The writer of this psalm is not mentioned, and the Jews have many absurd traditions respecting it; but, in all probability, David composed it, about the time that the ark was conveyed to Mount Zion, to be used in the worship at the sanctuary on the sabbath-days. (Notes, 1 Chr. xv. 16. xvi. 7.) Indeed, the sabbath was originally intended to give men leisure and opportunity for contemplating the works of God, and rendering him worship and praise. (Notes, Gen. ii. 2, 3. Ex. xx. 8-10. Is. lviii. 13, 14. Mark ii. 27, 28. Heb. iv. 3-11.)

V. 1, 2. 'It is no less delightful, than it is profitable, to sing hymns in the praise of the Divine perfections, which infinitely transcend all that can be said or thought of them.' (Bp. Patrick.) The majesty and greatness of God, with his lovingkindness in promising a Saviour and salvation, and his faithfulness in performing his promises, are especially noticed. (Notes, xxxiii. 1. lxxix. 1-4. cxlv. 1, 2. Marg. Ref.)

V. 3. Harp. Or, With a meditation or song on the harp. Perhaps the tune is meant. (Marg. Notes, xxxiii. 2, 3. cl. 3-6. 1 Chr. xvi. 4-6.)

V. 4, 5. The wisdom, power, and goodness of God, displayed in the works of creation and providence, are worthy of all admiration and gratitude; and the psalmist had experienced much of the tender care of the Lord towards him, and perceived many deep contrivances of his wisdom, in all the events of his past life; yet, it is probable that he was led by the Holy Spirit to look forward to the great work of redemption by the promised Messiah, as the ground of his hope, the source of his triumph and joy, and the chief subject of his praise.—'All are too little, O Lord, to express the joy I have in the acts of thy providence, by whom, as the world was made, so it is still governed. It ravishes my spirit, and makes me shout for joy, to think how excellently thou orderest and disposest all things.'... 'Whose administration, though I cannot fully comprehend; yet I admire the astonishing greatness of thy works, and reverence the unsearchable depths of thy counsels and designs.' (Bp. Patrick.)—'A prospect of creation, in the vernal season, fallen as it is, inspires the mind with joy, which no words can express; but how doth the regenerate soul exult and triumph at beholding that "work of God's hands," whereby he hath created all things anew in Christ Jesus! If we can be pleased with such a world as this, where sin and death have fixed their habitation, shall we not much rather admire those other heavens and that other earth, wherein dwell righteousness and life?' (Bp. Horne.) Notes, xix. 1-11. xl. 1-5. lxxi. 17-24. lxxviii. 8. cxxxix. 14. Rom. xi. 33-36.)

V. 6, 7. 'The natural man receiveth not the things of the Spirit of God; for they are foolishness unto him: neither can he know them, because they are spiritually discerned.' (Note, 1 Cor. ii. 14-16.) So that, while the sensualist who, like the brutes, seeks his happiness in animal indulgence, takes no pleasure in contemplating the works of creation and providence, and is incapable of perceiving or admiring the glory of God displayed in them; all other unregenerate, or ungodly men, (the persons denominated fools in Scripture,) are incapable of discerning, or delighting in the works of God, especially in the glorious and harmonious display of the Divine perfections in the work of man's redemption and salvation. And not only the sensualist, but all worldly men in general, being destitute of faith and spiritual discernment, are blind to the tendency and event of ungodly prosperity and pleasure. (Marg. Ref. Notes, xxxvii. 35-38. lxxiii. 18-22. 1 Sam. xxv. 36-38. Luke xii. 15-21. xvi. 19-25.)

V. 8, 9. (Marg. Ref. Notes, xxi. 8-12. lxxviii. 1-3. Is. xli. 10-16. 2 Thes. i. 7-10.)

V. 10. (Marg. Ref.) Fresh oil. Perhaps David might refer, by this expression, to his being re-anointed king upon his accession to the throne. This, however, was only an emblem of the fresh accessions of wisdom, strength,
